In addition to the geographic, military, and naval renunciations which Germany is called upon to make, she also accepts, at the affirmation of the Allies, responsibility for loss and damage incurred during the war and undertakes the restoration of Belgium with a reimbursement of all sums which Belgium has borrowed from allied governments, each of such payments to be made in the form of bonds; she agrees to pay, in the near future, the equivalent of 20,000,000,000 gold marks, and as further guaranty for the carrying out of the reparation exacted agrees to a direct application of her economic resources; and to assure these reparations, under the specifications which the treaty lays down, she undertakes to enact and enforce any legislation, orders, or decrees which may be necessary.

Under the heading of compensation which may be exacted from the vanquished foe is included damage to persons and surviving dependents arising through personal injury, or to civilian victims through acts of cruelty, violence, or maltreatment to allied civilians, either in German territory or in that occupied by German forces, reparation for all injury and compensation in the nature of pensions.

And among the items of reparation which may be exacted is the reimbursement of all costs which may accrue from pensions or compensation systems established by the successful belligerents.

Germany is forced to recognize the right for replacement, ton for ton and class for class, of all merchant vessels lost or damaged by reason of the war, to make atonement by absolute cession of its property in German merchant ships yet afloat, and to build, as soon as may be, new tonnage in an amount which shall be specified. In this connection Germany waives all claims of any description in respect to detention, employment, loss, or damage to any German ships, except as provided by the armistice; and equally waives all claim to vessels or cargoes sunk in naval action and subsequently salved.

Reiterating her obligation to devote her economical resources to the physical restoration of the areas invaded by German forces, Germany is further required, to the extent which the devastated powers may determine, to make restoration, or restitution, for animals, machinery, tools, building material, furniture, heating apparatus, and the like; and also to deliver horses, cattle, sheep, and goats to France, and to Belgium, in a number which the treaty fixes definitely. Furthermore, Germany will be compelled to deliver to France 7,000,000 tons of coal per year for 10 years, to Belgium 8,000,000 tons of coal per year for an equal period, and a varying quantity of coal to Italy up to the year 1929—and the treaty fixes the price to be paid for the same. Benzol, coal tar, sulphate of ammonia, and other products of distillation in fixed quantities must also be delivered and paid for under the terms which the treaty sets forth; dyestuffs and chemical drugs are subject to the same provisions; and no less than 13 submarine cables pass from the possession of the German Government and her nationals to the principal allied and associated powers. I have already spoken of the skull of the Sultan Mkwawa, which is to be handed over to King George of England; and in addition are the French flags and political papers taken from France in the war of 1870; the books, maps, and manuscripts from the University of Louvain; paintings from Ghent; and the copy of the Koran taken from Medina, which must now be placed in the keeping of that newest of potentates in a world made safe for democracy—his Majesty, the King of the Hedjaz. Besides this, Germany is obligated to pay the total cost of all armies in occupied German territory from the date of the armistice, including the general cost of all administrative and technical services connected therewith, and for the carrying out of all these reparations a carefully thought-out list of priority is made in the treaty.

There are many other items of reparation which the treaty contains, including the sum which the Reichsbank was to receive in behalf of the Ottoman public debt, the sums in gold transferred to the German Government as security for or in connection with loans made to Austria, and the restitution of benefits disclosed by the treaties of Bucharest and of Brest-Litovsk, and the German Government further obligates itself to possess itself of the rights of its nationals in any concession operating in Russia, China, Turkey, Austria-Hungary, and Bulgaria, to transfer them to the allied powers, and to accept credit for the accrued sum in the list of charges which the treaty imposes upon Germany. The powers also will take from Germany under the treaty any claim she may have for payment or repayment by the Governments of Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey, while to the Government of Brazil she guarantees the payment of a sum due for sales of coffee made in Germany before the war.

Germany is further forced to agree that products from allied Governments entering German territory shall be treated upon the most-favored-nation terms, and that no indirect means of customs regulations shall operate to change this. In addition, the products of Alsace and Lorraine for five years shall be admitted to Germany free of duty, while Alsace and Lorraine will receive from Germany free of all export duties certain yarns, tissues, textile materials, and other products desirable for the maintenance of the industries of Alsace and Lorraine. For 36 months Germany may not increase her customs duties over those of July 31, 1914, upon many of the products then subject to German tariff with the addition of wines, vegetable oils, and other products specialized in French manufacture.

During the period of occupation of any portion of German territory by allied troops this territory shall be subjected to a special customs régime established by the occupying forces.

Unfair competition is also regulated by the treaty, and specific safeguards are thrown about wines and spirits, to the presumable end that the product of French vineyards shall not be subject to German competition—and we, a Nation deliberately made dry, must help to maintain this sanctity of the French wine merchant.

The treaty further provides that Germany shall deliver up all securities and other documents of title held by its nationals and relating to property situated in the territory of any allied power, and all accounts, vouchers, records, and information which concern the investments of allied nationals in properties which have been subjected to exceptional war measures, or to transfer, in any German territory or any territory occupied by her.

In the financial clauses of the treaty all classes of insurance are dealt with, and it is provided that any allied power within a specified time may cancel all contracts of insurance between its nationals and any German insurance company, which latter is compelled to hand over to the power thus acting a proportion of its assets involved in this action. Industrial property forms another subject with which the treaty deals, and by its terms Germany and German nationals are estopped from any claim for rights in industrial, literary, or artistic property, its sale or the use of its products, and each of the allied powers is entitled to impose such limitations and restrictions as it chooses upon the rights of German industrial, literary, or artistic property within its territory.

Free and unrestricted transport of commercial products, without discrimination or preference and with the most-favored-nation treatment, is procured by the treaty for the benefit of the allied powers; and Germany may not refuse to enter into tariffs or combinations of tariffs designed to secure for any allied ports advantages which are similar to those which German ports enjoy. In this connection, the free zones of German ports, as existing prior to the war, must be maintained; and all harbor, lighthouse, or other port charges which shall be established for the benefit of any power shall immediately and unconditionally be granted to all the allied powers.

The Elbe, the Oder, the Niemen, and the Danube are internationalized under the treaty; and Germany is compelled to cede to the allied powers tugs, vessels, and other material of all kinds necessary for the utilization of these river systems. The Rhine, like the Danube, is placed under the control of an international commission established by prior convention; and Germany shall deliver to France the river tugs and vessels, docks, warehouses, and other facilities at the port of Rotterdam. To France also are given special rights for the building of weirs upon the right bank of the Rhine, and the like rights are guaranteed to Switzerland, if she shall demand them. In addition to the concessions above noted to be granted at Rotterdam to the French Government, the Czecho-Slovak State is to receive in the ports of Hamburg and Stettin free zones and other facilities upon terms to be fixed by an international commission.

German railroads are equally brought within the treaty's jurisdiction; and Germany binds herself to secure freedom of transit with most-favored-nation treatment, and to display special activity in the establishment of through-ticket service for passengers and their luggage; these activities are to apply equally to emigrants as to tourists; and German railway cars are to be fitted with facilities which shall enable their wide use in international commerce.

The Kiel Canal is internationalized under the terms of the treaty.

As guarantees for the execution of the terms of the treaty, provision is made for armies of occupation during a period of fifteen years, with provision for reoccupation in the event that the German undertakings are not completed within that period.

These, Mr. President, are only a part of the deservedly drastic terms imposed upon Germany by the treaty. They constitute a victor's peace; and with them I have no quarrel. "Vae victis" is the agonizing cry which has gone up from every battle field since the human race learned to fight; and my only criticism of the penalties which I have only in part enumerated is that they were not promptly and rigorously imposed upon a crushed and humiliated foe eight months ago, and that they are now presented to us with the argument that they square "as a whole with the principles agreed upon as a basis of peace."

These principles, Mr. President, have trod a thorny path. First promulgated, under this roof, on the eighth day of January, 1918, they were, we have lately been told, "readily acceded to as the principles to which honorable and enlightened minds everywhere had been bred." They spoke, we have been assured, "the conscience of the world as well as the conscience of America"; but it was with a happiness which the written result does not justify that there fell from the President's lips his "tribute of respect and gratitude" for the "constant effort" of his fellow negotiators "to accommodate the interests they represented to the principles" which all had agreed upon.

This agreement, Mr. President, was almost wholly suppositious, so far as the resultant provisions of the treaty are concerned. We look in vain through its 267 pages for the elusive fourteen points of peace. Open covenants long since took to hiding; the freedom of the seas was treated with scant courtesy at Paris; the establishment of equality-of-trade conditions among nations consenting to the peace is nowhere to be found in this instrument; the earlier doctrine of no annexations and no indemnities long since became a tragic joke; and there remains alone, so far as present negotiations have been reduced to written form, the general association of nations established by specific covenant.

Neither can we find here, Mr. President, any confirmation of the prediction that this treaty was to be written in disregard of the old order of the balance of power and with no element of national commercial greed. The balance of power expressed in geographic terms does not, it is true, appear; but all the elements of greed, national suspicion, and jealousy are only too evident in almost every article of the treaty. "The treaty," says an eminent English commentator, "is triple nonsense. It expects Germany to earn vast sums and to earn them without the right and facility to trade abroad. It expects some Government to impose this servitude on the German workers, yet denies to that Government the army which alone might hold them down in outward obedience. It robs 15,000,000 Germans of subsistence and omits to provide them with a field for emigration."

In short, Mr. President, the sun of commercial expansion in which Germany sought a place passes into total eclipse behind this treaty; and the shackles with which she is to be manacled in her obscurity have been forged with meticulous care by "the forward-looking men" with whom the President was privileged to cooperate at Paris, but whose cooperation was strictly limited to looking out for themselves, while not omitting to see to it that the United States should be made a full partner in every phase of the enterprise designed for the benefit of the other members of the big five. No one could find fault with this, Mr. President, if it had been done in the open, or if it were now brought to us with no pretense that the deed squares "as a whole with the principles agreed upon as a basis of peace," and that the inevitable compromises "nowhere cut to the heart of any principle."

It naturally follows, Mr. President, that a treaty such as this can not be self-operative; and we have been assured that, if we examine it, we shall find that everywhere throughout its manifold provisions its framers have felt obliged to turn to the league of nations as the indispensable instrumentality for the maintenance of the new order which this instrument purposes to set up. Among the specific results to be secured by use of the indispensable instrumentality of the league have been enumerated to us the establishment of a free city like Danzig; properly safeguarded plebiscites by means of which certain populations at some future date shall choose their sovereignty; certain uniform arrangements for the settlement of anticipated difficulties of final decision for provisions in the treaty itself; the long-continued supervision of the task of reparation which Germany is to undertake; reconsideration and revision of administrative arrangements and restrictions which the treaty prescribes; the throwing of safeguards about the rights of national, racial, and religious minorities; opportunity to limit and regulate military establishments where they are most likely to be maintained; opportunity of effecting complete systematic internationalization of waters and railways necessary to the free economic life of more than one nation; and to clear many of the normal channels of commerce.

The evidence of the manner in which these great results are to be achieved through the indispensable instrumentality of the league of nations will be found best of all, Mr. President, in a study of the text of the treaty itself; and before taking up any detailed recital of treaty provisions, which may prove to be tedious, but which, nevertheless, it is our duty to scrutinize before we give our consent, I wish to call the attention of the Senate and the country to the manner in which the signatories to the instrument have separated themselves into two distinct groups—the first comprising the United States, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan, and everywhere throughout the treaty described as the "principal allied and associated powers"; and the second, all the other belligerents—with the exception of Costa Rica, whose absence from the peace table has not yet been explained—to the number of 22, and "constituting, with the principal powers mentioned above, the allied and associated powers." We find occasional mention in the treaty of another group, described as the "allied powers," presumably the former entente, and all three groups are found to perform vital functions in the treaty, stipulations for which natural thought would turn to the league of nations as the indispensable instrument.

For instance, in the delimitation of the new frontier line between Belgium and Germany, it is not the league of nations, but a commission of seven persons, five of whom will be appointed by the principal allied and associated powers, who will assume this task. Equally, in connection with the renunciation of the privileges conferred upon Germany with relation to the Grand Duchy of Luxemburg, it is not the league of nations who will procure for the Grand Duchy the most-favored-nation treatment which Germany provides for others, but the principal allied and associated powers.

In matters of controversy relating to the return of Alsace-Lorraine to French possession, it is not the league of nations which functions, but the Central Rhine commission—an organization set up years ago under the old order, and now made use of in the light of a new day.

In the establishment of the new Czecho-Slovak State, which was made the subject of special comment in our chief negotiator's report of his doings at Paris, it is not the league of nations which will determine its frontiers—even though it later must guarantee them—but it is the principal allied and associated powers, who, through a commission of seven members, five to be named by them, will trace the frontier line between Poland and Czechoslovakia; and in the proceedings necessary to protect the rights of the racial, linguistic, and religious minorities in Czechoslovakia, it is not to the league of nations that these oppressed people turn, but to the principal allied and associated powers.

Similarly with Poland, Mr. President. Where boundaries for the new Poland are not definitely laid down in the treaty, it is not the league of nations that will determine them, but the principal allied and associated powers, and a plebiscite there to be taken in respect of Upper Silesia is to be carried on not under the benign ægis of the league of nations but by a régime set up by four of the principal allied and associated powers; and it is to take place in a region which the troops of those powers will occupy. Moreover, Mr. President, in Upper Silesia this commission exercises full powers of sovereignty, without reference to the league of nations, for a period which may extend as long as 18 months, or even for an indefinite period, after the proposed plebiscite has been had; and it is not to the league of nations that the result of the vote will be communicated, but to the principal allied and associated powers, who also shall delimit the frontier and fix the time when the indigenous peoples shall take over the government of their own nation.

And for the protection of the racial, linguistic, and religious minorities in Poland, it is not the league of nations which will interpose the strong arm of defense, but the treaty which Poland agrees to make with the principal allied and associated powers.

So, too, with East Prussia. On the withdrawal of German troops and authorities from that area a commission of five members appointed by the principal allied and associated powers, with no reference to the league of nations, shall move in and take possession; they shall conduct plebiscites which they shall report not to the league of nations but to the principal allied and associated powers; and these powers will fix the frontier and determine what portion of the deficit in the budget shall be paid by the inhabitants of East Prussia.

Like provisions for the Kreise of Stuhm and Rosenberg are also contained in the treaty. Here it is not the league of nations but the principal allied and associated powers which will take possession of the territory, and what is even more significant shall, if occasion arises, be supplied with necessary military force. It is they and not the league of nations who will conduct a plebiscite, make return, and will give ultimate title to the area and perform all necessary intermediate functions.

The stipulations with regard to the territory of Memel are even more simple; for it is not in favor of the league of nations that Germany renounces all rights and titles to this area, or even to a commission, but to the principal allied and associated powers direct. Mr. President, if the treaty is ratified the United States of America will become possessed in fee simple of one undivided fifth part of the territory named, and then these powers will have full power to effect a settlement, particularly in so far as concerns the nationality of the inhabitants, which settlement Germany is bound to accept.

The free city of Danzig, the creation of which we have been assured could not have been brought about except through the indispensable instrumentality of the league of nations, constitutes an interesting subject in the stipulations of the treaty; and the significant language in the opening sentence of article 100 is that Germany renounces its rights and titles over Danzig and necessary environing area, not to the league of nations, but in favor of the principal allied and associated powers, who are to appoint a commission to delimit the frontier and to establish Danzig as a free city and then place it under the league of nations, whose only function will be to appoint a high commissioner for the free city; while it is the principal allied and associated powers who will negotiate the treaty with the Polish Government by which the latter shall "accept exceptional obligations with regard to the use of its port," and shall take over the conduct of the free city's foreign relations and the diplomatic protection of its citizens when abroad. And all property of the German Empire within the free city of Danzig passes, not to the league of nations under whose protection the free city stands, but to the principal allied and associated powers, who shall have complete liberty to distribute this property to the free city or to the Polish State as they may see fit.

So, too, with the redistribution of sovereignty over Schleswig. It is not the league of nations who will occupy the ancient duchy when German troops and the soviet councils have been withdrawn or dissolved, but a commission named by the principal allied and associated powers; and it is this commission which will conduct the inevitable plebiscite, reporting, not to the league of nations, but to the principal allied and associated powers. And it is these powers which shall delimit the frontier; it is to them that Germany definitely renounces her rights of sovereignty; and it is they who hand over to the Kingdom of Denmark the portion of Schleswig assigned to it.

The limitation of armaments has been presented to us, Mr. President, as one of the fundamental purposes of the league of nations, and it is natural to suppose that such limitation as the treaty provides in this respect would be confided to the wise heads and the active hands of the league. Yet, nowhere in the instrument does this appear to be the fact. Throughout the whole line of minutely detailed stipulations which reduce Germany to military impotence it is not the soothing agency of the league of nations which essays the task, but the strong arm of the principal allied and associated powers.

We have been told, Mr. President, that the negotiators at Paris studied how best to put ill-governed colonies into the hands of governments which are to act as trustees for the people and not as their masters, and that there was to be some common authority among the nations made responsible in the execution of this trust. This common authority can refer to none other than our old friend the league of nations; and yet in that portion of the treaty which deals with the German colonies, the initial declaration is that Germany renounces in favor of the principal allied and associated powers and not to the league of nations all her rights and titles over her overseas possessions.

The President has spoken to us of the Turkish Empire, which he discloses as having fallen apart, and his plain implication was that here again the league of nations would be an indispensable instrumentality; yet the treaty provides that so far as Germano-Turkish relations are concerned, the sums in gold and silver had or supposed to be had in German possession with reference to the Ottoman debt and other Turkish fiscal transactions are to be paid not into the honest hands of the league of nations as trustees, but to the principal allied and associated powers. In like manner sums in gold held as pledge or as collateral in connection with German loans to the Austrian-Hungary Government, the benefits disclosed by the treaties of Bucharest and the Brest-Litovsk, and all monetary instruments, specie, securities, negotiable instruments or goods received under these treaties, pass into the possession of the principal allied and associated powers, and are to be disposed of in a manner which those powers shall hereafter determine.

I shall not dwell upon the shameful episode of Shantung, Mr. President, pausing only to say that it is not to the league of nations but to Japan that Germany renounces her rights, title, and privileges under the provision of the treaty.

The provisions for rendering Germany harmless in a military sense occupy many pages of the treaty, Mr. President; and, as I have said before, it would be natural to suppose that the league of nations would be the indispensable instrumentality for bringing this about—particularly since it is only with reference to Germany that any steps have been taken toward that delimitation of armament which is to be found, I assume, not in the immediate present, but somewhere beyond the spotlight which now shines on the pathway ahead. But, here again the word of promise is broken to the ear and hope alike; for it is a conference of military experts of the principal allied and associated powers, and not the league of nations, which will fix the reductions to be made in the number of German effectives, and it is to the principal allied and associated powers that Germany will report as to the limited stocks of munitions and guns, the armament, and the few fortified works which she will be allowed to retain. It is not the league of nations but the principal allied and associated powers who will approve the location and restrict the number of factories and works wherein Germany will be permitted to manufacture arms, munitions, and war materials. It is to the principal allied and associated powers, not to the league of nations, that Germany must surrender her surplus war material; and it is these powers, and not the league of nations, who will direct the manner in which this surrender will be effected. And when, Mr. President, the German Government shall disclose, as she must, the nature and mode of manufacture of all explosives, toxic substances, or other like chemical preparations used by her in the war or prepared for the purpose of being so used, is it to the league of nations, is it to Sir Eric Drummond that these lethal formulæ shall be turned over for deposit in the massive vaults which doubtless will form part of the equipment of the league of nations palace at Geneva? By no means; it is the principal allied and associated powers who will take over and assimilate this deadly knowledge.

The diminution of German forces upon the sea is likewise deemed by the treaty of too much importance to be turned over to the league of nations, and it is the principal allied and associated powers who will fix the number of mine-sweeping vessels which Germany may maintain, to whom will be turned over German warships now interned in neutral ports, who will receive the enumerated battleships which Germany must surrender, who will select the destroyers and torpedo boats which Germany must give up, who will supervise the breaking up of German warships now under construction, who will take possession of the submarines, their salvage vessels, and docks, including the tubular dock, which Germany must hand over, who will indicate the allied ports to which the surrendered submarines must be taken, and who will supervise the breaking up of submarines under construction, the demolishment of which Germany has promised. Moreover, Mr. President, it is the principal allied and associated powers, and not the league of nations, who will fix the quantity of arms, munitions, and war materials which German warships may have on board, who will take over the surplus of all naval war material in excess of that which Germany may maintain, who will designate the areas in the Baltic Sea which Germany must sweep and keep clear of mines, who will supervise the demolishment of and the removal of guns from German fortifications in the areas between the North Sea and the Baltic, and to whom Germany shall deliver all the hydrographic information which it possesses concerning the channels and waters in this area.

The indispensable instrumentality of the league of nations thus readily dispensed with on sea and land for the effective purpose of disarmament is as clearly negligible in the air, Mr. President, for it is the principal allied and associated powers and not the league of nations to whom Germany must deliver her surplus of aeronautic material, planes, dirigibles, shelters, gas plants, engines, armament, and equipment. And, Mr. President, in connection with all of these finely-developed minutia of detail for producing the military impotence of Germany, it is neither the league of nations nor any of its instrumentalities which will function, but an interallied commission appointed for the purpose by the principal allied and associated powers to whom Germany must render all facilities, to whom Germany must make its reports, and to whom Germany must turn over its surplus.

Even in the humanitarian and sentimental aims which the treaty purposes for the repatriation of prisoners of war and interned civilians, and for the protection of graves, it is not the agency of that embodiment of all humanitarianism and of sentiment, the league of nations, to whom the treaty turns, but special commissions composed of representatives of the allied and associated powers.

It will be noted, Mr. President, and it probably will be urged by the advocates of the league of nations, that these instances which I have adduced of apparent neglect of the league as an indispensable instrument in carrying out the new order which this treaty sets up, deal, after all, with considerations more or less temporary. In a limited sense this is true. However, if the league of nations is the perfect agency which it has been described to be there is no ample reason why it should not immediately begin its functions; and the failure of the negotiators at Paris to make use of it is clearly indicative of some distrust at least of its efficacy. This conclusion becomes more evident as we advance in the treaty and reach the provisions for reparation whereby the many obligations, restrictions, and penalties which are imposed upon Germany are to be carried into effect. The President himself adverted to this theme when he last spoke to us, for he enumerated, among other functions which the league of nations would assume, "the long-continued supervision of the task of reparation which Germany is to undertake to complete within the next generation" and which, he asserted, without the league "might entirely break down."

If it shall break down, Mr. President, the league of nations may be held blameless; because nowhere, in any essential particular, is the "long-continued supervision of the task of reparation" committed to the league. That duty will rest in the hands of an interallied commission to be called the reparation commission; and the terms of its establishment disclose the singular clarification of counsel which our fellow signatories at Paris held with reference to the league of nations. The provisions of the treaty in this respect, Mr. President, are unique. Delegates to this commission shall be nominated by seven nations—the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, Belgium, and the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, each of whom will appoint one delegate and an assistant delegate to act in the illness or absence of his principal. Of the seven delegates thus comprising the commission on no occasion shall more than five have the right to take part in the proceedings of the commission and to record their votes. But the delegates of the United States, Great Britain, France, and Italy shall have this right on all occasions. The delegates of Belgium, Japan, and the Serb-Croat-Slovene State shall have this right when questions particularly concerning their interests are under consideration. So that the four above-named delegates with the perpetual right to vote will always constitute a majority of the seven who will comprise the commission and the United States must always take part in the proceedings.

This commission, Mr. President, has many and widespread powers. At the outset it will take over bonds of the German Government in the sum required to make reimbursement of the moneys borrowed by Belgium from its allied Governments, and shall give receipt thereof on behalf of Belgium to the exclusion of the sovereign rights of that power; and the commission is further empowered to determine the amount of compensation to be afforded Belgium for the restoration of the damage done in that country by German forces during the war. And, in addition to its authority for making provisions under which Germany's total obligation of reparation shall be paid within a period of 30 years, it is empowered to extend the period of payment if its discretion shall so indicate. This commission shall fix, up to the 1st of May, 1921, the manner and the sums in which Germany shall pay the allied and associated powers the equivalent of 20,000,000,000 gold marks whether in gold, commodities, ships, securities, or otherwise; it shall lay down procedure for the return by Germany of cash taken away, seized, or sequestered, restitution of animals of every nature, and securities thus taken away or seized; and Germany agrees irrevocably to the possession and exercise by this commission of the great power and authority given to it under the terms of the present treaty.

In this day of open covenants openly arrived at, and in the new era where the light streams so brightly upon our path, it is interesting further, Mr. President, to note the absolute requirement in the treaty that all proceedings of this commission shall be private, unless for special reasons and on particular occasions the commission shall decide otherwise.

In addition, the commission shall "in general have wide liberty as to its handling and controlling of the whole restoration problem," and "shall have authority to interpret" the provisions of reparation which the treaty makes. It is recognized—shall we say in further affront to the league of nations—as "the exclusive agency" of the participating governments for "receiving, selling, holding, and distributing the reparation payments to be made by Germany" under the reparation sections of this treaty. And, in carrying out its extensive functions, it shall have authority to require Germany to cover such portions of approved claims as are not paid in gold or in the enumerated equivalents by the issue of bonds or other obligations. It is also empowered and directed to examine the German system of taxation and to satisfy itself that "in general the German scheme of taxation is fully as heavy proportionately as that of any of the powers represented on the commission."

The decisions of this commission may be rendered in two ways. On six classes of questions "unanimity is necessary," and these questions involve the sovereignty of any of the participating powers; the cancellation of the whole or any part of the German debt; the determination of the amount and conditions of German bonds; their issuance, selling, negotiation, or distribution; the postponement, total or partial, within certain limitations, of installments upon the reparation fund; and questions of the interpretation of the provisions of the treaty under which the commission shall act. In all other cases the action will be taken by majority vote, and its decision shall, without further proceedings, "forthwith become binding and be put into immediate execution." The commission further will issue to the interested powers its certification of the amount of German bonds which it holds for each of the beneficiaries; and certificates stating the amount of goods delivered on account of reparation debt and held by the commission for the account of any power; and these certifications when registered and upon notice to the commission may be transferred by indorsement, thus adding to the existing volume of bonds and other obligations of the allied governments a vast and unknown quantity of German warehouse certificates and notes of hand indorsed by powers of whom we shall be one.

I have indicated, Mr. President, that this commission runs until 1951; but it may run much longer in the event that Germany shall find herself unable to pay under the terms imposed, and, in consequence, the treaty provides that the commission shall be dismissed only "when all the amounts due from Germany and her allies under the present treaty" have been paid, or when "the decisions of the commission have been discharged and all sums received, or their equivalent, have been distributed to the powers interested." And in this connection, Mr. President, it may not be unworthy of notice that the press dispatches from Paris, thus far standing uncontradicted, say that our representative on this great commission, taking the responsibility for our participation in this prolonged and troublesome task, is Mr. Edward Dulles, who, being unknown either in business or in public life, is identified to the public mind mainly by the fact that he is a nephew or some other connection of the present Secretary of State.

This commission, Mr. President, will exercise control over the shipyards of Germany through its power to determine the amount of tonnage to be laid down for the account of reparation for shipping lost in the war. It will draw the specifications of the ships to be built, the conditions under which they are to be built and delivered, the price per ton at which they are to be accounted for, and all other questions relating to this matter. In other words, Mr. President, this commission, constituted as I have said, will enter upon the shipbuilding business in Germany; and it is to be hoped that the mistakes made by this country when embarking upon a like enterprise will not find repetition.

This commission will also receive and distribute the animals, machinery, equipment, tools, and like articles of a commercial character, the reconstruction materials, heating apparatus, furniture, and the like, which Germany must repay in kind. The commission will determine the value to be attributed to these and will undertake to deliver them as specified. The commission may require of Germany, as part of its reparation, the delivery of dyestuffs and chemical drugs, not exceeding 50 per cent of the total stock of each which was found in Germany or under German control at the date of coming into force of the treaty; and it shall fix the price of this material.

The powers of the commission react in one particular upon States other than Germany, inasmuch as the powers to whom German territory is ceded undertake to pay a portion of the debt of the German Empire as it stood prior to the war, to be collected on a basis fixed in the treaty subject to the judgment of the restoration commission, together with the portion of the debt of each German State in which such ceded territory stood before the war, the exact amount to be determined by the commission.

I have by no means exhausted the list of powers and duties which the reparation commission will assume, but I hope that I have made it clear that this agency, deriving its authority, not from the league of nations but from the principal allied and associated powers, is in fact the indispensable instrumentality which will furnish the long-continued supervision of Germany's bitter program of atonement.

Shall we turn now, Mr. President, to another question with which this encyclopedic treaty deals—the question of adjustment of debts between the nationals of enemy powers, their property rights and interests, their contracts, prescriptions, and judgments? These are always matters of delicate adjustment upon the conclusion of any war, and exceptionally so in the case of a war as widespread as this and involving so many nations of commercial activity. These questions particularly, Mr. President, would appear to fall within the beneficent diplomatic functions of an indispensable instrument like the league of nations, but instead you will find that the treaty commits them to a mixed arbitrable tribunal set up between Germany and each of the allied and associate powers.

I make no pretense, Mr. President, to have touched, within a wide margin, the total number of particularized references which the treaty makes, respectively, to the league of nations and the signatory powers as active agencies for carrying the treaty stipulations into effect, and I have made no effort to summarize the myriad manner in which the reparation commission is to function. But even this incomplete summary is sufficient, I think, to demonstrate that the negotiators of the treaty had no respect for the league of nations as an indispensable instrument such as the President has sought to make us believe. Numerically stated, Mr. President, the number of references to these respective agencies under the treaty to which I have referred may be summarized as follows:

The principal allied and associated powers figure 76 times; the allied and associated powers figure 45 times—a total of 121. Whereas the league of nations figures altogether only 57 times, and of these, 21 refer to its nebulous connection with the administration of the Saar Valley; 18 in connection with the labor clauses of which the league is supposed to be the special champion, and only 3 to Danzig, in relation to which we have been told the league is a prime necessity, leaving only 15 references to general activity for the league of nations in the entire 253 pages which constitute the treaty apart from the covenant of the league itself.

These figures, Mr. President, should be sufficient not only to refute the claim that the league of nations is an indispensable instrumentality in carrying out the provisions of this treaty; but they also serve as an effective denial of the defiant claim made in New York on the 4th of March, 1919, that the league of nations "if we could but form it, would be an invaluable instrument through which to secure the operation of the various parts of the treaty; and that when the treaty comes back, gentlemen on this side would find the covenant not only in it but so many threads of the treaty tied to the covenant that you can not dissect the covenant from the treaty without destroying the whole vital structure." It will be neither a delicate nor a difficult task of dissection, Mr. President, to remove from the treaty the 15 general provisions which it contains in regard to the league of nations; and I assume that France will be able to assimilate the Saar Valley and that an international council of labor can be set up even if the league of nations shall never come into being.

I hope, moreover, Mr. President, that an examination of the treaty will convince others, as it has convinced me, that the instrument is infinitely worse for us than even the league of nations, bad as it is; for whatever may be said of the baleful consequences which will flow to the United States from the operation of the league of nations, they are, after all, in futuro; whereas the provisions of this treaty immediately and without recourse thrust us automatically and by authority into the endless snarls of attempting to set new boundaries for contentious races in Europe and impose upon us a share in the task of holding Germany in leash, of stifling her commercial and industrial development, and even of framing and applying the most essential of her internal statutes. Once drawn into these meshes of international complications, Mr. President, it will be difficult for us to extricate ourselves, and I would have the Senate and the country realize fully, before we set our seal of approval upon this instrument, that it means a complete departure from all the traditions and principles which have governed us from the foundation of the Republic; that it means our entrance into and our active participation in all of the numberless broils which now exist in troubled Europe and which the next few years will multiply; and I hope, Mr. President, that before any such irremediable course is decided upon both the Senate and the country will study carefully this treaty in all its bearings.

In this connection, Mr. President, it is worth noting that this is only the first of four similar instruments. The treaties with Austria-Hungary, our only remaining enemy; with Bulgaria, and with Turkey, against whom we have never declared war, but to which we shall be signatories, are yet to come. When we contemplate the number of entanglements presented by the present treaty I shudder to think of that which will be disclosed when we attempt to make ourselves party to the controversy over the remaining portions of Czechoslovakia; to the disposition of the Banat; to the tracing of the lines for Italia irredenta, Albania, Epirus, Greece, Bulgaria, Roumania, the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, Thrace, Bessarabia, Asia Minor, and the middle East.

Disraeli, returning from the Congress of Berlin, summed up his labors there in the laconic phrase, "Peace with honor." Yet neither peace nor honor flowed from the treaty of Berlin, certain conditions of which—unenforced and unenforceable—contained and disseminated the germ of the present war. It is to be hoped that none of the phrase makers of to-day will be permitted to repeat Disraeli's fatal error of word and deed; and it lies in our hands, Senators, to make sure that this shall not be done. This treaty of Versailles is as menacing to the peace of the world to-day as the treaty of Berlin was 40 years ago, and unless we can make in it changes which I deem primarily essential I shall not vote for its ratification.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question, if he would not object. Is it not true that the reparation commission, in addition to the powers the Senator has enumerated, has the power to commit acts of war which Germany agrees not to regard as acts of war, such as the taking of territory?

Mr. MOSES. Without question, Mr. President, the reparation commission has the power to commit acts of warlike aggression which but for the exceptional terms of this treaty would be regarded as acts of war.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. BECKHAM obtained the floor.

Mr. GRONNA. With the consent of the Senator from Kentucky, I ask unanimous consent to submit a report.

Mr. BECKHAM. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. GRONNA. I am directed by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to report back favorably with an amendment the bill (H. R. 7413) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

I had hoped, Mr. President, on account of the pressing necessity of securing funds for the Agricultural Department, to have this bill passed to-day. I find, however, that the day has been set aside for the important purpose of discussing the peace treaty and the league of nations; and several Senators have also requested that the bill be printed. Therefore I shall content myself by asking that the bill be printed, and I give notive that to-morrow, at the earliest opportunity, I shall ask to have the bill taken up for discussion and final disposition.

Mr. President, if I may say another word, I request, if possible, that the bill may be taken up to-morrow, because it is highly important that it should be speedily disposed of. I am sure that almost all Senators here know that in the western section of the country forest fires are raging and the Agricultural Department is without funds with which to quench them. Something ought to be done speedily to give the much-needed relief.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

PEACE TREATY AND LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, in the comparatively brief time which I shall occupy upon this subject it is not my purpose to enter into a full discussion of the details of the treaty or the covenant of the league of nations, but to confine my remarks principally to some general observations upon the whole subject. I am going to ask, in doing so, what other Senators have done on similar occasions, that in pursuing my line of argument I may be excused from any interruptions.

Mr. President, in approaching the discussion of the league of nations at this stage of its consideration one must realize that practically everything has been said about it, either for it or against it, that could be said, and in speaking upon it I can not indulge the hope of throwing any new light upon the subject or of producing any fact or argument that might change the opinion of anyone.

For many months it has absorbed the attention and the consideration of the people of the civilized world as the most important and far-reaching problem affecting the peace and welfare of every nation. Upon its proper disposition and settlement may depend, not only our own prosperity and happiness, but the prosperity and happiness of generations yet unborn. I do not exaggerate, I am sure, the situation when I say that it marks a most critical and fateful epoch in the world's history. It invites and it deserves the best thought and the profoundest consideration that our people can give any subject. We stand upon the threshold of a new era so big with its possibilities and its problems that we may well hesitate, take our bearings, study our course, and appeal to divine guidance that we may not make a false step.

The American Senate has upon it in the consideration of this matter a solemn and tremendous responsibility; and never before has its judgment and intellect been summoned to the consideration of a greater problem. As we pause in our national pilgrimage at this fork of the road, anxious to know which way we should proceed, duly alarmed at the grave consequences of a mistaken decision, and greatly confused by the clamor of conflicting advice, it is but natural that we, the Members of this body, now called upon to ratify the treaty, should exercise the highest degree of caution and prudence in making a choice so fraught with results of good or ill, not only to the people of our own Nation, but to the people of the rest of the world.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I have not been one of those who have been disposed to criticize or rebuke those who take a different view from mine on this question. If there ever was a time when a subject deserved the utmost liberality of thought and breadth of view in its discussion upon the part of those who differ in their opinions, that time is now. Political predilections or personal prejudices should not for a moment enter into the mind of any Senator in dealing with a subject like this. It is one that transcends all partisan or personal issues, and one which should receive the fairest and most impartial consideration that the mind of man can give. Woe unto that party or that person who would seek to bring it down to the level of a partisan or political issue. The temper of the American people will not tolerate such a degradation, and would be swift to visit upon the offender a just and proper rebuke.

While I have my views upon this question and intend to support the treaty, including the covenant for the league of nations, for reasons which it is my purpose in part to discuss, I have never for a moment in my mind doubted the sincerity and patriotism of those distinguished Senators who have different views from mine and who have on numerous occasions so ably and eloquently expressed their opposition to it. I recognize that they are just as good Americans as any of us. They are inspired, I am sure, by the same spirit of devotion to our country's welfare as any of us who advocate this league can claim. Beyond doubt they honestly believe in the apparent perils which their imaginations have conjured and their eloquence has so graphically pictured as the results to follow the adoption of such a league.

Neither, Mr. President, have I been inclined to believe that partisanship has exercised its malign influence in determining the attitude of Senators on this matter, either for it or against it, despite the color given to such a charge by the ill-starred and untimely "round robin" at the close of the last session of Congress presented only to Republican Senators and signed only by members of that party. In the hurry and confusion of the closing hours of the session it can be well understood that its import and significance did not receive that thoughtful consideration upon the part of the signers as it deserved, and such as they would ordinarily give to any matter of importance. That celebrated document served no good purpose and had no effect other than it might have further embarrassed our representatives at Paris in the peace conference in the very difficult work in which they were engaged.

I can not believe that those in the Senate or out of it who will control and direct the policies of the Republican Party will commit the very serious mistake of undertaking to make this question or any feature of it a party issue. It is not the part of one upon this side of the Chamber to give advice to them upon any matter of party expediency, but I believe that I may take the liberty of delivering a warning to them, that if they go before the American people in the presidential and congressional elections next year with their hands bloodied with the mutiliation or defeat of this league of nations, then their party and its candidates will meet at the polls the most ignominious and overwhelming defeat in all of its history. Those leaders of that party who are flushed with abundant hope in the light of the congressional elections of last fall and think the Republican Party is marching on to a victorious triumph in the campaign and election in 1920 would do well, before they cast the fortunes of their party against this league, to study and take account of the mind of the American people on this subject.

As I have indicated before, I earnestly hope that this question will be kept above the level of an issue in partisan politics; but if it is made such an issue it will be made so by the leaders of the Republican Party and not by the Democratic Party. And if it should become such an issue it will, I firmly believe, redound beyond doubt to the advantage and success of the Democratic Party.

Why do I say this, Mr. President? It is because of my confident belief that the common sense of a vast majority of the American people see in the adoption and operation of this league of nations the best guaranty of the future peace of the world and the surest protection against wars it is possible for men to devise. That common sense which has nearly always directed the American people in times of great crises is a safer and more reliable guide for governmental action than the most learned and profound arguments of statesmen. Able and eminent Senators may make the most skillful and powerful arguments upon this floor or elsewhere against the league, calling attention to what they consider its imperfections or its technical defects, and no matter how sincere and eloquent they may be, their arguments must at last stand the test of this common sense, which in the end will determine the fate of this treaty, and whether or not our country shall become a member of the proposed league of nations.

I have listened carefully to some of the able addresses delivered by opponents of the league on this floor, and I have been in sympathy to some extent with the spirit which animated the Senators who delivered them. I have fully appreciated their strong sentiment of Americanism, their devotion to the teachings of the fathers of the Republic, and their aversion to any variance from the traditional foreign policies of our Government; and I for one would never censure them for their opposition to this measure, if they believe that its adoption would mean that our country would thereby sacrifice and abandon any of those great principles upon which it has grown and prospered to such a marvelous degree of power and strength. I confess that I am loath that we should take any step that might embroil our people needlessly in the quarrels and strifes of European countries or of any other countries.

When they speak of American isolation from foreign complications I wish with all of the fervor of my heart that we might possess that desired isolation, which, after all, is only a vain dream of their patriotic imagination. What an admirable situation it would be, Mr. President, and how stoutly should we maintain it, if it were true that we could look upon a European conflict with a spirit of benign indifference, and with no obligation upon our part to take a hand in it, except so far as we might see fit in a spirit of humanity and justice to interpose our good offices and our disinterested purposes to bring about peace and conciliation in those war-stricken lands. How much better it would be for us as a Nation on such occasions, if we need only to aid them by precept rather than by participation, and if we could only by our good example of governmental excellence show them how they, too, should live, rather than be compelled to send our armies and our Navy over there and by force teach them that they must not only keep peace among themselves, but that they must refrain from trespassing upon the inherent rights and privileges of American citizens.

But, alas, Mr. President, that boasted and unattainable isolation for us does not exist and never has existed since this Republic began its career. It exists less now than it did in the beginning. In each general European war since the beginning of our Government the wisest of our statesmen and the most peaceful of our administrators have been unable to keep us out, notwithstanding the supposed security of isolation.

In the wars following the French Revolution it required the supreme wisdom and patriotism of Washington and his advisers to keep this country out of direct participation in those conflicts. In the Napoleonic Wars, during the administrations of Jefferson and Madison, the statesmanship of those great Presidents was taxed to the utmost in their efforts to guide our Nation from the tempestuous seas of those struggles, and even then the provocations became so unbearable and humiliating that the peace-loving Madison could no longer hold back the inevitable issue, and in 1812 we became involved in that conflict in our war with England.

Those were days, too, when there seemed to be some reason, at least geographical reason, to rely upon the apparent advantage of isolation. An ocean 3,000 miles wide separated us, and at that time no steam-propelled ship had ever crossed its stormy paths; no cables nor wireless had flashed across it their instantaneous messages.

How different is the situation now, and to how little does that wide expanse of water amount! The broad ocean, by reason of the remarkable progress of science and invention, is little more than a narrow river separating the continents. Steam, electricity, and the wonders of modern science have annihilated those great distances, and, politically speaking, our Nation, its people, and its business are practically contiguous in their relations to the people of Europe. We may not like it, but we can not help it.

If we could not avoid a part in European conflicts of more than a century ago, how much less reason is there for us to hope to avoid it in these days under such vastly changed conditions? President Madison in the years preceding 1812 did not strive more earnestly and patriotically to keep this country out of that war than did President Wilson in the years preceding 1917 strive to keep it out of the awful European conflict which was so recently brought to a successful conclusion. We can all well see now how inevitable was our participation in that struggle from the time that Germany, in 1914, marched her murderous hordes through Belgium and northern France.

For nearly three years, with admirable patience and the wisest statecraft, our President bore with the provocations which challenged us to the conflict and endeavored to avail our country of the supposed advantage of isolation. So great were those provocations and insults, and so patient and earnest was our administration in its efforts to save us from the tremendous sacrifices of war, that there were many who charged it with cowardice and pacifism. At last the irresistible tide, against which the hand of no man nor set of men could stand, carried us into it, and with what results I need not now relate.

One of the lessons which we should learn as a result of this war, if we did not know it before, however unpleasant it may be to us, is that we need not ever again talk of isolation as an element in national safety. It is, therefore, surprising, Mr. President, that men of such distinguished ability as some of those who oppose this league should undertake to argue now on that line and seek to solace us with the shattered delusion that we can maintain isolation or separation from European quarrels, however odious and abominable they may seem to us.

In June, 1914, the shot fired from the pistol in the hand of a fanatical assassin at the Archduke Ferdinand at Sarajevo, a town so remote from us that scarcely any Americans had ever heard of it, lighted the fire which set the whole world in bloody conflagration and sent to their death tens of thousands of American boys upon foreign battle fields. How then can we hope for immunity or protection from those troubles in the future? If geographical distances and political ideals have not protected us in the past, how can we expect them to do so in the years to come? Let us banish forever that idle dream, however soothing it may have been to our sense of national security.

The American people, Mr. President, know these things, and it is their unfailing common sense which will set at naught the adroit and eloquent arguments of the opponents of the league. That common sense teaches them to ask these questions of the opponents: "Let us admit that there is some force in your criticism of various sections of the league, do you not think it is, on the whole, worth while trying? All other methods have failed in the past to keep the peace of the world. Triple alliances, entente cordiales, balances of power have all failed and broken down, and is it not well for us to try another plan, one which comes to us with the indorsement of the leading statesmen of all the nations who took part in the peace conference at Paris? Your arguments are plausible. We share that spirit of Americanism which pervades them, but where do they lead us? You propose no other remedy. Your criticism is destructive and not constructive. Without this league of nations what have we as a protection against future wars? If your position is correct and the league should be abandoned, then you would put us back to the statu quo ante bellum. That would be intolerable, and we would never agree to such a determination. We would infinitely rather take this league as it is, admitting the imperfections which you describe, than to go back to the international chaos that made possible the horrible tragedy which bereaved the whole world, sent to slaughter nearly 8,000,000 of the strong and brave young men of the world, and left in its wake a train of sorrow and desolation never before equaled in all history."

That, Mr. President, seems to me to be the way in which the great common people of the country are looking at this question. They have seen with remarkable quickness and precision that flaw in the argument of the opposition which suggests no substitute, which proposes no plan, which offers no remedy to protect us in any way whatever from the hideous monster of war. They are not deluded with the hope that this league will be an absolutely certain and sure preventive of future wars. They realize that no instrument of this kind can be at once framed and promulgated without imperfections or defects; but they do believe that it is infinitely better than any plan hitherto followed by the nations of the earth, and that it does offer the best hope that we can find to secure peace in the future.

They are willing to try it, Mr. President. The great majority of our people, beyond any doubt in my mind, favor its trial. Their fears have not been excited to any great degree by the gloomy pictures in the arugments of the opponents of the league. They are unwilling to believe that in article 10, or in some of the other sections which have been so severely inveighed against, there are hidden instruments of mischief that may at some time in the future be used to our great injury and loss. They have read that much-abused article 10, which says:

> The high contracting parties undertake to respect and preserve, as against external aggression, the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all States members of the league. In case of any such aggression, or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression, the executive council shall advise upon the means by which the obligation shall be fulfilled.

The common-sense citizen in reading that article does not see in it the many snares and mares' nests and evil demons which have possessed and inflamed the lurid imaginations of some orators, who have attempted to describe it as a veritable Pandora's box of trouble and danger. His common sense quickly answers these prophets of disaster with the unalterable conviction that if article 10 had existed as a part of international law in the early summer of 1914 and had been recognized as an obligation upon the part of those nations which were afterwards engaged in the war with Germany, as they now propose to recognize and enforce it, then that war would never have occurred and its untold and incalculable sacrifices would never have had to be made. Instead of article 10 being an invitation to war, as some have described it, it will become the greatest insurance we can possibly secure against war in the future.

Let us compare, Mr. President, section 5 of the Knox resolution with this article 10 in the covenant. The Senator from Pennsylvania, who introduced that resolution, is one of the ablest and strongest opponents of the proposed league and has delivered in the Senate several speeches against it which received the most respectful and earnest attention. It is true that section 5 was stricken out of the resolution by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and it is understood that it was stricken out in order to secure enough votes to pass the other sections of the resolution. Section 5 reads as follows:

> That, finally, it shall be the declared policy of our Government, in order to meet fully and fairly our obligations to ourselves and to the world, that the freedom and peace of Europe being again threatened by any power or combination of powers, the United States will regard such a situation with grave concern as a menace to its own peace and freedom, will consult with other powers affected with a view to devising means for the removal of such menace, and will, the necessity arising in the future, carry out the same complete accord and cooperation with our chief cobelligerents for the defense of civilization.

Does article 10 go any further than that in principle? Does it obligate us any more to go to war than we would be obligated if section 5 of the Knox resolution was substituted in its place? Practically the only difference that I see between the two is that article 10 as a part of the league of nations will have all the machinery ready for operation when the danger or menace may arise, and section 5 of the Knox resolution does not contemplate such machinery, and before it could be provided war would be on, and the purpose of it would be defeated so far as the prevention of war might be concerned. It is true that article 10 seems to place upon us a more direct obligation, but that obligation of action on our part would not arise unless by a unanimous vote of the executive council in which this country would have its vote. Nor could article 10 operate to limit or annul the provision in our Federal Constitution which gives Congress alone the right to declare war and to provide money and means to carry on war. We therefore do not need any reservation upon that article, because we have under the league the protection contained in the requirement of a unanimous vote and the reservation which our Constitution provides as to the power of Congress to declare war.

I believe, Mr. President, that our constitutional provision alone is ample protection to us in that respect; for if at any time the executive council by unwise or unjust action should seek to involve us in a difficulty to which we should not properly be a party Congress could in such a case, without incurring a just charge of violation of our obligations under the treaty, use its discretion before declaring war or supplying the means with which to conduct it.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], in a very able and exhaustive address delivered in the Senate one day last month in favor of the league of nations, called particular attention to this section 5 in the Knox resolution. After quoting that section, the Senator said:

> Mr. President, I would be satisfied if that section 5, without elimination or addition, should be the only compact between the great nations of the world. All I would ask would be that it be signed by the other members of the league of nations as their concurrent policy. That would, in my opinion, prevent unjust wars as effectively as the 26 articles of the proposed national league.

What the distinguished Senator says deserves the most earnest consideration, for he has given to this subject the deepest thought and the most careful treatment. No partisan bias, no personal prejudices have entered into his mind in urging a decision upon so momentous a subject, and he stands conspicuously upon his side of the Chamber as a champion of the principles of the league of nations, which for many years past have been advocated by distinguished leaders in both of the great political parties in this country.

Mr. President, this idea of a league of nations is not new, for it has been advocated for many years by distinguished leaders of thought, not only in this country but in other civilized countries. Even before the European war started, in August, 1914, the plan had begun to attract the attention of many men in every country, and numerous societies were organized to work for the cause of international peace and the adoption of some league of nations which would, as far as possible, guarantee the peace of the world. Unfortunately, when the matter reached the stage where President Wilson found the opportunity to aid in embodying in a definite and practical form this principle, many who in the past had favored the idea began to change their position and to find fault with the plan adopted by the peace conference in Paris. I shall not undertake to quote from the addresses and writings of those who once favored a league of nations, but who now pick flaws in the proposed league and withhold their support from it. We shall let that pass. I shall refer only to the position of two eminent Americans who have held the highest office within the gift of our people.

Former President Taft has been for many years, and is now, one of the ablest and most enthusiastic supporters of a league of nations. He has advocated this proposed league in a way that has won the admiration of most of his fellow countrymen. No President of our country, after he had gone out of that high office, has gained more in the hearts of his countrymen by his conduct and his service than Mr. Taft has done. There are many who believe that he is stronger to-day before the people than he has ever been, and while it might not be altogether to the taste and liking of some of the Republican leaders, it is not by any means unlikely that he may win the presidential nomination of his party next year. Those of our Republican friends who are not particularly fond of him and who would object strenuously to seeing him nominated for the Presidency, had well take warning in the rapidly growing strength of this eminent American.

Another distinguished leader of that party, the late Col. Roosevelt, was also an ardent advocate of a league of nations, and I am going to take the liberty of quoting two utterances of his on that subject, which should remove all doubt about his position. These two utterances were repeated in the able address delivered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] some time ago in the Senate, but they are so much to the point that I believe it well to call attention to them again.

When he accepted the Nobel peace prize at Christiania, in 1910, he said in part:

> It would be a master stroke if those great powers honestly bent on peace would form a league of peace, not only to keep the peace among themselves, but to prevent, by force if necessary, its being broken by others. The supreme difficulty in connection with developing the peace work of The Hague arises from the lack of any executive power, of any police power, to enforce the decrees of the courts.

Again, in a letter from him to the New York Times, October 18, 1914, he expressed his views on the subject:

The one permanent move for obtaining peace which has yet been suggested, with any reasonable chance of obtaining its object, is by an agreement among the great powers, in which each should pledge itself not only to abide by the decision of the common tribunal, but to back with force the decision of that common tribunal. The great civilized nations of the world which do possess force, actual or immediately potential, should combine by solemn agreement in a great world league for the peace of righteousness. * * *

They should, furthermore, not only agree to abide, each of them, by the decision of the court, but all of them to unite with their military forces to enforce the decree of the court as against any recalcitrant member. Under these circumstances it would be possible to agree on a limitation of armaments that would be real and effective.

I understand, Mr. President, that some of his close personal and political friends have stated that if Col. Roosevelt were living to-day he would be vigorously opposed to this league. In the light of what he said on the two occasions to which I have referred, it seems to me that these friends do an injustice to his memory when they say that he, if living, would repudiate the ideas and principles which he so well expressed on those occasions. Those ideas have been embodied in a practical form in this league, and I am unwilling to believe that the distinguished former President, if he were living to-day, would take such a position as some of his friends say he would.

I wish that it might be, Mr. President, when the time comes to pass upon this treaty in the Senate and the roll is called, when each Senator shall register his vote upon the record of this body, that no one inside or outside of this Chamber shall ever be able to point to the vote of a single Senator and have reason to say that his judgment upon this grave subject was influenced by prejudice, dwarfed by partisan bias, or misled by some lurking ill will toward the person of the distinguished President of the United States whose guiding genius had so much to do with the framing and character of this historic document. I know that the best of us are not always free from such influences, operating frequently in an unconscious way upon us in our deliberations upon many matters that come before us.

But surely, Mr. President, if there ever was a time that time is now, if there ever was a question that question is this, when each Senator should divest himself of every prejudice of any kind and rise to the plane of that broad Americanism and statesmanship, look at this great subject with unclouded vision, and with a heart and mind so free that only the real merit of the document will be considered and not the personality of anyone responsible for its production. Let us remember that it is the measure and not the man that we are considering. Let us be constantly reminded that we are dealing with a question of world-wide importance, a question touching the peace and welfare not only of our country but of the other nations of the earth, and let us not descend into the mire to play a miserable and disgraceful game for political advantage or personal pique.

It has developed, Mr. President, recently that the opponents of the league have seized upon the disposition of the Shantung Peninsula by the treaty as one of their strongest points of objection to the ratification of the treaty. We have heard it discussed lately a number of times upon the floor of the Senate and elsewhere in the country. Opponents of the league have directed some of their heaviest fire at this provision, and in some instances it has been given as a reason to justify the defeat of the treaty.

This, it seems to me, is one of the shallowest arguments yet advanced by the opposition. It is one, however, that appeals to sentiment and to the imagination, and the opponents of the league have not failed to play upon that feature of it and to exaggerate its importance in relation to the multitude of far more vital problems which this treaty undertakes to settle.

The Shantung Peninsula, with its ports, as we all know, was in the possession of Germany, and had been since 1898, when Germany siezed it by force from China. That seizure was wrong, as all admit, but it was acquiesced in by the other nations of the world. It is not for us at this time to enter into a discussion of that wrong. In the latter part of 1914, after Japan had entered the World War against Germany, she acquired this Province by force of arms from Germany and has held it since then. She has announced solemnly on several occasions that it is her purpose to restore the Province to China and has pledged her faith and honor as a nation to do so. I am one of those who believe that she will keep her promise, not only as an act of national good faith, but also in view of the fact that with so much attention drawn to this question her honor as a nation would be forever so tarnished in the eyes of the world if she failed to do so that she would suffer irreparable injury. It is, I believe, unfair, as it is certainly indiscreet, for Senators upon this floor to attack her good faith before she has broken it or has been given sufficient opportunity to fulfill her promise and obligation.

But it is not my purpose, Mr. President, to discuss all of the features of this question. I have referred to it and briefly recited some of the facts in regard to it in order to call particular attention to one view of the subject which I have not yet heard discussed upon the floor, but which it seems to me is one that deserves the most serious consideration in justice to Japan's position. Senators have criticized the peace conference, and particularly our representatives there, in not demanding that Japan should surrender that Province immediately and in not having put in this treaty a provision compelling her to do so. Have Senators thought what this meant to Japan, whose people are so sensitive, and who already felt aggrieved at the refusal of the conference to place in the treaty some provision on the race question?

Japan met her allies in that conference as an equal, as one who had taken part in the war with them, and as one of the five great powers which practically dictated and controlled the terms of peace. She had acquired territory from Germany by conquest; so had England; so had France; and Italy had acquired territory from Austria. Was there a reason why Japan alone of all the Allies should be singled out and compelled by the terms of peace to surrender immediately territory which she had acquired when her other allies were not asked to be subjected to such treaty stipulation? In effect, Mr. President, such an insistence by the other allies upon Japan to surrender Shantung Province by a provision in the treaty of peace would have meant this: "We, the representatives of the allied and associated Governments in this peace conference, although you have been one of our allies in the prosecution of the war, do not trust you; and notwithstanding that you have given your solemn word that it is your purpose in due time to surrender this Province to China, we demand that it be now stipulated in this treaty and definitely fixed as to terms and time."

If such had been done, Mr. President, it would have been the only case of the kind in this treaty. I for one do not believe that Japan, even if it might have been her intention and wish to surrender that Province to China the next day, could have agreed to such a provision without a sacrifice of her self-respect and an aspersion being cast upon her national honor. That was one of the most difficult problems before the peace conference, and one which, I believe, they treated in the only way possible for the present. We must in this case rely upon the future for its proper and honorable settlement.

The position of Japan on this question is well illustrated in a statement given out by Baron Makino, one of the Japanese peace delegates at Paris, on April 30, 1919, in which he said:

We are accused of intending to occupy Kiaochow permanently. That is inexact. We have agreed to restore it to China. Our agreements will hold—our agreements always hold. There is no example in history of Japan breaking her word. It is just because nobody has the right to doubt our honor that we ourselves should be allowed to arrange restitution and not be compelled in a way that would indicate unjust suspicion.

From now on international law and justice will stand upon a higher plane than ever before, especially if this league of nations is adopted. Many serious and grave issues which in the past were settled only by armed conflicts will be settled hereafter by a sense of fair dealing and right. A nation guilty of dishonor or of a broken promise will not be able in the future to stand before the rest of the world in the glare of its just condemnation. It is impossible that this treaty, the most comprehensive in all of the history of the world, should not have in it here and there some article or adjustment which does not square with the strict principles of equity and justice. No one can claim that it is perfect. But anyone makes a serious mistake if he seizes upon some imperfection in it as a reason to defeat the whole treaty. I think that under all of the circumstances the peace conference did the best it could in regard to the Shantung issue, and I can not believe that even if a mistake was made it is sufficient to justify a single vote against the ratification of the treaty. Let Japan be given the opportunity to make good her promise to right the wrong, originally committed by Germany, before we undertake this severe and improper criticism of her.

Mr. President, it has occasionally been observed since this discussion began some months ago that there was much in the opposition to the league of nations to recall to us the opposition to our Federal Constitution after it was adopted by the convention in 1787 and before its ratification by all of the States. I have myself from the beginning been greatly impressed by this parallel between the two events, and I have been frequently reminded by the arguments used against this league of how similar in character and often in presentation are they to the arguments used in some of the State conventions that were held to ratify the Federal Constitution.

The adoption of that instrument was the greatest experiment in government ever tried by man. It is easy for us now, with our long perspective view, to see how futile, if not foolish, were some of the arguments used against its adoption. We naturally wonder that some of the eminent statesmen of that time could have offered such objections to it or could have hesitated to give it their enthusiastic approval. And yet I believe, Mr. President, that those men, many of them of great distinction and ability, had as much reason to fear disastrous results from the adoption of that Constitution as to-day the opponents of the league of nations have to fear from the adoption of this covenant.

Let us endeavor to carry ourselves back to that period in our history, unenlightened by any of the events subsequent to the adoption of the Constitution. Let us try to look into the future from that time as our forefathers did, and we can better appreciate the difficulties that confronted them. They realized what an experiment it would be. They dreaded lest the young country, with its thirteen independent States, might embark upon a sea of greater danger and peril than they had escaped from in severing their relations with the mother country.

Even Thomas Jefferson, whose political wisdom and foresight have never been excelled by any man in his or any other generation, said in a letter to John Adams of November 13, 1787, after the Philadelphia convention had framed the Constitution and submitted it to the States:

> How do you like our new Constitution? I confess that there are things in it which stagger all my disposition to subscribe to what such an assembly has proposed. The House of Federal Representatives will not be adequate to the management of affairs, either foreign or Federal. Their President seems to be a bad edition of a Polish king. He may be elected from four years to four years for life. * * *

And he goes on, calling attention to other objections to the document. In another letter to a friend, dated December 31, 1787, he said:

> As to the new Constitution, I find myself nearly a neutral. There is a great mass of good in it, in a very desirable form, but there is also, to me, a bitter pill or two. I have written somewhat lengthily to Mr. Madison upon this subject, and will take the liberty to refer you to that part of my letter to him.

Does not that, Mr. President, illustrate the position of many of the opponents of the league of nations?

But as time went on Mr. Jefferson began to change his attitude toward the Constitution and became one of the advocates of its adoption. On May 17, 1788, in a letter to a friend—and I commend this, Mr. President, most earnestly to the consideration of those who hesitate about changing a position when once taken and invite their attention to the intellectual operation of one of our country's greatest statesmen in advocating the adoption of an instrument which his caution at first led him to seriously doubt—he said:

> Your situation will doubtless be improved by the adoption of the new Constitution, which, I hope, will have taken place before you receive this. I see in this instrument a great deal of good. The consolidation of our Government, a just representation, an administration of some permanence, and other features of great value will be gained by it. There are, indeed, some faults, which revolted me a great deal in the first moment, but we must be contented to travel on toward perfection step by step. We must be contented with the ground which this Constitution will gain for us, and hope that a favorable moment will come for correcting what is amiss in it.

Ah, Mr. President, what wisdom there is in those few sentences from the sage of Monticello. How wonderfully appropriate are they to this occasion. How easily can we imagine that if he were here now taking a part in this debate he might say to us as he said then, and I take the liberty of repeating his impressive words:

> There are, indeed, some faults, which revolted me a great deal in the first moment, but we must be contented to travel on toward perfection step by step. We must be contented with the ground which this Constitution will gain for us, and hope that a favorable moment will come for correcting what is amiss in it.

I know of no better guide than that for us to follow. That was the position of the wisest and most far-sighted statesman this country has produced. He urged the adoption of the Constitution as it was and its improvement or amendment later. He did not favor the rejection of it in whole or in part, and thereby send it again into the chaos of another convention. He had some objections to it; but with his wonderful mind and his great patriotism he saw that the good in it outweighed what might be defective and that those defects could be removed by amendments subsequent to the adoption of the Constitution. As was generally the case with him, his vision was prophecy. He did not insist upon amendments before adoption, nor did he urge any "reservations," which would have delayed, if not defeated, the ratification of the Constitution.

But there were others, Mr. President—great men, too, but men who could not climb to the intellectual altitude of Jefferson—who preferred being consistent to being right and who would not avail themselves of that privilege which is usually exercised only by the very weak or the very great, and that is the privilege of changing one's opinion or position upon a subject in the light of wider information and of deeper thought. I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate by giving an account of many of these instances of distinguished opponents to the adoption of our Constitution. I shall therefore refer only to one or two others.

One of the most conspicuous and eloquent opponents was Patrick Henry, and his opposition to the ratification of the Constitution in the Virginia convention is historic and well known. No one for a moment would ever question the patriotism and courage of that man, whose thrilling oratory first hurled defiance at the British King and set afire the spirit of independence in the Colonies. And yet when the time came to make good that independence by the combination of the 13 States into a strong Federal Government no man fought more persistently or vigorously against it. He saw, as he thought, only danger and disaster if the Constitution should be adopted. With that power of speech for which he was famous, he described with burning words the evils which he thought would follow such a step.

In Wirt's Life of Patrick Henry he describes one occasion in the convention, and says:

> Mr. Henry rose next. * * * Instead of proceeding to answer Mr. Nicholas, he commenced by sounding an alarm calculated to produce a most powerful impression. The effect, however, will be entirely lost upon the reader unless he shall associate with the speech, which I am about to lay before him, that awful solemnity and look of fearful portent by which Mr. Henry could imply even more than he expressed, and that slow, distinct, emphatic enunciation by which he never failed to move the souls of his hearers.

Does not that remind us, Mr. President, of some of the stirring eloquence to which we have listened on this floor in some speeches against the league of nations?

Further on Mr. Wirt says of him on this occasion:

> The very tone of voice in which he would address the chairman when he felt the inspiration of his genius rising—"Mr. Chairman"—and the awful pause which followed this call fixed upon him at once every eye in the Assembly—

And so forth.

Let me give, Mr. President, a few extracts from some of Patrick Henry's speeches against the ratification of the Constitution. On one occasion he said:

> I conceive the Republic to be in extreme danger; if our situation be thus uneasy, whence has arisen this fearful jeopardy? It arises from this fatal system; it arises from a proposal to change our Government; a proposal that goes to the utter annihilation of the most solemn engagements of the States; a proposal of establishing nine States into a confederacy to the eventual exclusion of our States.

Again, he says:

> This proposal of altering our Federal Government is of a most alarming nature. Make the best of this new Government—say it is composed by anything but inspiration—you ought to be extremely cautious, watchful, jealous of your liberty; for instead of securing your rights you may lose them forever. If a wrong step be now made, the Republic may be lost forever. If this new Government will not come up to the expectation of the people, and they shall be disappointed, their liberty will be lost, and tyranny must and will arise. I repeat it again, and I beg gentlemen to consider, that a wrong step made now will plunge us into misery and our Republic will be lost.

But it is not necessary for me to give any further extracts from his speeches to show the very sincere and earnest alarm which he felt.

Another distinguished opponent of ratification in the Virginia convention said:

> The confederation has been deservedly reprobated for its inadequacy to promote the public welfare. But this change is, in my opinion, very dangerous. It contemplates objects with which a Federal Government ought never to interfere.

He goes on further to enumerate some of his objections to the Constitution, and to express his fear of what would happen if it should be adopted. That, Mr. President, was James Monroe, who many years afterwards became President of the United States under that same Constitution which he had so vigorously opposed.

I might be permitted, Mr. President, here to suggest that the experience of James Monroe in that respect may offer some measure of consolation or of hope to any of our distinguished colleagues in the Senate opposing this league, whose ability and amiability eminently qualify them as eligible in the coming search for a presidential candidate of the Republican Party, and who may after all find themselves not totally disqualified for such a distinction by reason of their having opposed the ratification of this treaty as it is. However, I might remind them in a spirit of affectionate concern that after James Monroe opposed the ratification of the Constitution he had to wait nearly 30 years before the presidential lightning struck him.

The fears which those misguided leaders in those days so earnestly felt and so eloquently expressed were never realized. Their visions of danger and disaster proved to be rhetorical delusions. The great common sense of the people prevailed. The people spoke. The Constitution was adopted. They took it with its imperfections, and as time went on they remedied it with amendments. And under that Constitution, what a wonderful record has been made! Framed as it was for the government of 13 States and three or four millions of people, it has proven itself strong enough and broad enough to embrace within its enfolding provisions the greatest Nation on earth, with 48 proud States, and with more than a hundred millions of the freest and happiest people on earth. What a glorious achievement it has been, and all in the comparatively brief period of less than a century and a half. And what, Mr. President, would have happened if the solemn warnings and the fiery eloquence of those patriotic leaders who opposed the adoption of the Constitution had prevailed? But thanks to that Divine Providence which guided us then, as it has so often done in our periods of danger, and as it will do in this crisis, the common sense of the people asserted itself, and gave to us this inheritance, the most priceless boon ever enjoyed by any people on earth.

Shall we now listen to the prophets of evil? Shall we be frightened by the ominous picture of gloom which they paint so luridly before our eyes? Shall we be dismayed by the vehemence of their arguments and eloquence? No, Mr. President, I believe not. Their arguments, however subtle and plausible; their eloquence, however impassioned and persuasive, are matched against the common sense of the people of this land who can see through it all, and with the principle of Jefferson to guide and inspire them they will say, "Give us this covenant of the league of nations now. It is the best plan that has ever been offered us to preserve international peace. It is the work of some of the wisest statesmen in the world. We shall take it as it is without amendment or reservation now, but improve it where time and experience may show its imperfections." That was the Jeffersonian idea in regard to the Constitution of the United States. That idea is as good now as it was then, and it is the idea which is rallying to the support of this document the great majority of the people of this country.

The peace of the world may be involved in our action. No more solemn responsibility ever came upon the Senate of the United States. A world wearied and sickened with bloodshed, broken and disabled with the ruin and devastation of the most destructive war in all human history, looks to us to put the seal of our approval upon this work of the peace conference, and give to it the one and only means which it believes will serve as any reasonable guaranty against war in the future. No advocate of this document can proclaim it perfect. No idealist can safely promise that it beyond all doubt removes the possibility of war in the future. But it at least comes to us with a promise that if given a fair trial, if improved where improvements may be found necessary later on, and if supported by the civilized governments of the earth, it will certainly be a tremendous advance over all previous plans, and one that may in reality fulfill the dream of its most enthusiastic advocates, a world-wide and an enduring peace.

I have not undertaken, Mr. President, to enter into a discussion of all of the details of this proposed league of nations. Those features of the discussion have been well and ably presented by other Senators. In my opinion, the technical arguments which have been so forcibly urged against the various articles of the treaty have been successfully met by others who have spoken for it.

The President of the United States has done a great work for his country and for all the world. He has labored in all these months at the table of the peace conference with the earnest effort and the sublime hope that out of its work there might come peace, justice, and freedom to all the people of the earth. He has brought back to us in the document now before us the result of that work. It represents the judgment and wisdom of the best thought of the civilized nations. The obligation is now upon us. The eyes of the world are watching us. The keen gaze and scrutiny of the people of this country will not fail to see the motives and purposes that may actuate us in what we do. We should dedicate to this subject the best thought, the highest patriotism of which we are capable. Their hope at present is in us, and we dare not and should not disappoint them.

PROPAGANDA ON PACKING INDUSTRY.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I had intended to submit some observations on the power of the propaganda of the packers to-day, but I note that there is only one speech scheduled for to-morrow on the league of nations and the treaty of peace. That being the case, I think I will postpone it until to-morrow. I give notice that at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] I shall offer some observations on the propaganda of the meat packers.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened and (at 4 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, July 23, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 22, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Once more we have been called upon, our Heavenly Father, to witness a disgraceful riot in this peaceful city where laws are made and expected to be executed promptly and successfully.

Is it the effect of our public-school system, our churches and Sunday schools, or our home training? We do not know. Thou knowest all things. Point out to us, we pray Thee, clearly where the defects are and give us the grace to right them.

Take away from us the hateful thing we call race prejudice and help us to live in peace and harmony, law and order, justice and mercy. In the name of Him who taught us love and good will. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ABSENCE OF A QUORUM.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Clearly there is no quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Anthony	Goodall	Jones, Pa.	Morin
Ashbrook	Goodykoontz	Kahn	Neely
Browne	Greene, Vt.	Kearns	Newton, Mo.
Caldwell	Griest	Kettner	Olney
Doughton	Hamill	King	Purnell
Echols	Hamilton	LaGuardia	Ragsdale
Fairfield	Harrison	Lee, Ga.	Rouse
Fields	Hicks	Lesher	Sanford
Focht	Hull, Iowa	Lever	Scully
Fordney	Hull, Tenn.	McClintic	Sisson
Fuller, Mass.	Hutchinson	McCulloch	Slemp
Garland	Ireland	McKenzie	Tilson
Godwin, N. C.	James	Mason	Wise

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and eighty-two gentlemen have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague, Mr. ECHOLS, of West Virginia, have the privilege of extending his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a patriotic address delivered by him in West Virginia on the 4th of July.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent that his colleague [Mr. ECHOLS] have the liberty of extending his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a Fourth of July address delivered in West Virginia. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What was the subject of that address?

Mr. REED of West Virginia. A patriotic address.

Mr. GALLIVAN. On what?

Mr. REED of West Virginia. I think there was some of the league of nations in it and other things——

Mr. GALLIVAN. Nothing about prohibition?

Mr. REED of West Virginia. No.

Mr. GALLIVAN. All right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes on the subject of conditions in the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes on the subject of conditions in the District of Columbia. Is there objection?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LEVER, by unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina, was granted leave of absence for 10 days on account of business.

NEAR EAST RELIEF.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Speaker lay before the House the bill S. 180 in order that it may be placed on its passage in lieu of the bill H. R. 412, the latter being a similar bill and No. 36 on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to take up the bill S. 180. But it is not in order until the previous question now pending is disposed of, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PROHIBITION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair places before the House the bill H. R. 6810, the prohibition-enforcement bill, on which the previous question has been ordered and which has been ordered to be engrossed and read a third time. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, did not some statesman over on that side demand the reading of the engrossed copy?

The SPEAKER. The demand was made last night.

Mr. CLARK of Misouri. I know it was, and it has never been complied with.

The SPEAKER. The Chair considers that the request is not now pending. Anybody can make the request now if he wishes to do so.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not wish to do so, but I wanted to know what became of that request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it died with the session, but anybody can make the demand now if he wishes to do so.

The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was read a third time.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit, and on that I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Missouri opposed to the bill?

Mr. IGOE. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. IGOE moves to recommit the bill H. R. 6810 to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following amendment: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That whoever, on or after the date when the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States goes into effect, shall knowingly manufacture, sell, or transport within the United States, or import into the United States or export from the United States, any intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes shall be fined not more than $500 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both, and for a second or subsequent offense shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

"SEC. 2. That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, his assistants, agents, and inspectors, shall investigate and report violations of this act to the United States attorney for the district in which committed, who is hereby charged with the duty of prosecuting the offenders, subject to the direction of the Attorney General, as in the case of other offenses against the laws of the United States; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, his assistants, agents, and inspectors, may swear out warrants before the United States commissioners or other officers of courts authorized to issue the same for the apprehension of such offenders. Section 1014 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby made applicable in the enforcement of this act.

"SEC. 3. That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the Attorney General of the United States are hereby respectively authorized to appoint and employ such assistants, experts, clerks, and other employees as they may deem necessary for the enforcement of the provisions of this act, and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be required for the enforcement of this act."

The SPEAKER. On the foregoing motion the gentleman moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri demands the yeas and nays on the motion to recommit.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 137, nays 256, answered "present" 2, not voting 35, as follows:

Godwin, N. C.	Hutchinson	Mason

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

On the vote:

Mr. SCULLY (for) with Mr. HUTCHINSON (against).

Mr. CRAGO (for) with Mr. JONES of Pennsylvania (against).

Mr. HARDY of Texas (for) with Mr. DOUGHTON (against).

Mr. HAMILL (for) with Mr. IRELAND (against).

Mr. CALDWELL (for) with Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas (against).
Until further notice:
Mr. MERRITT with Mr. ASHBROOK.
Mr. KING with Mr. NEELY.
Mr. PURNELL with Mr. MCCLINTIC.
Mr. HICKS with Mr. HULL of Tennessee.
Mr. FOCHT with Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina.
Mr. GRIEST with Mr. LESHER.
Mr. HAMILTON with Mr. LEE of Georgia.
Mr. MASON with Mr. KETNER.
Mr. TILSON with Mr. LEVER.
Mr. SLEMP with Mr. SISSON.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to vote "no."

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall, listening?

Mr. CRAMTON. I was in the front row of seats, and did not hear my name called.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes the gentleman to answer that question.

Mr. CRAMTON. I can not say how particularly or how closely I was listening.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman listening?

Mr. CRAMTON. I could not say as to how closely I was listening.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must leave it to the gentleman to qualify himself.

Mr. CRAMTON. I was in the Hall, in the front row of seats, and failed to hear my name called.

The SPEAKER. Unless the gentleman can answer the question in the affirmative, he can not vote.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Speaker, I have a pair with my colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. JONES. Mr. JONES is in favor of this bill and wanted to vote for it, but is unavoidably absent. I take it that he would have voted against the motion to recommit. Therefore I wish to change my vote from "aye" to "present" and have myself recorded as paired with Mr. JONES on this and following questions.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to vote "nay."

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall, listening, when his name was called?

Mr. KNUTSON. I thought my name was called and started to answer and they had gone on beyond.

The SPEAKER. The rule is very clear. If the gentleman answers in the affirmative, he can vote.

Mr. KNUTSON. I would like to ask the Speaker under what provision of the Constitution my district is to be deprived of a vote?

The SPEAKER. That is not a proper question. Was the gentleman in the Hall, listening?

Mr. KNUTSON. I was.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman can vote.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. KNUTSON, and he voted in the negative.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. Those in favor of the passage of the bill will, when their names are called, answer "aye"; those opposed will answer "no."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 287, nays 100, answered "present" 3, not voting 40, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. GRIEST with Mr. BOOHER.

Mr. FOCHT with Mr. LESHER.

Mr. BROWN with Mr. WELLING.

On this vote:

Mr. ASHBROOK (for) with Mr. MERRITT (against).

Mr. HUTCHINSON (for) with Mr. SCULLY (against).

Mr. JONES of Pennsylvania (for) with Mr. CRAGO (against).

Mr. DOUGHTON (for) with Mr. HARDY of Texas (against).

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The announcement of the vote was received with applause.

On motion of Mr. VOLSTEAD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

REQUEST TO PRINT.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the prohibition bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the bill just passed. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLIVAN. I object.

LEAVE TO FILE MINORITY VIEWS.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to file the views of the minority on H. R. 7500. It is agreed by the committee that that may be done.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks leave to file the views of the minority on H. R. 7500—from what committee?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MINIMUM COMPENSATION.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the minimum-compensation bill, H. R. 5726, and ask that it be placed on its final passage.

The SPEAKER. The business before the House is the minimum-wage bill, H. R. 5726, on which the previous question was ordered last Wednesday. The bill has been ordered to be engrossed and read a third time. The next thing in order is the third reading of the bill.

The bill was read a third time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I have a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I am opposed to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANTON moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Labor with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following amendment: Add a new section properly numbered, as follows:

"Sec. —. It is specially provided that after a proclamation of peace is made by the President the bonus of $240 per annum shall be no longer paid to employees affected by this minimum-wage bill, but that $3 per day and $90 per month shall be the maximum received by said employees."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, upon that I move the previous question, and I ask for the yeas and nays on the vote.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] to recommit.

Mr. BLANTON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused, one Member, not a sufficient number, seconding the demand.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 1, noes 219.

Accordingly the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. On that I ask for a division.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 328, nays 48, not voting 54, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Until further notice:

Mr. MCPHERSON with Mr. SMITHWICK.

Mr. MOTT with Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin with Mr. WISE.

Mr. LONGWORTH with Mr. STEELE.

Mr. BROWNE with Mr. CALDWELL.

Mr. DENISON with Mr. GRIFFIN.

Mr. JONES of Pennsylvania with Mr. DOUGHTON.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan with Mr. HOWARD.

Mr. KNUTSON with Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi.

Mr. MCKINLEY with Mr. WEBB.

Mr. IRELAND with Mr. HAMILL.

On this vote:

Mr. HUTCHINSON (for the bill) with Mr. CRISP (against).

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. NOLAN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. GOODYKOONTZ, is fulfilling the promise he made some time ago to address the West Virginia Bar Association. If he had been present, he would have voted for the prohibition bill and also for the minimum-wage bill.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. CRAMTON. Upon what subject?

Mr. SMALL. On prohibition.

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, I do not see the gentleman from Massachusetts present.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I am here; just came in.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLIVAN. I object.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, there must be some mistake; I do not think the gentleman from Massachusetts intended to object to my request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts did object.

Mr. SMALL. I renew my request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of prohibition. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, it occurs to me that such a permission should be granted to gentlemen on both sides alike.

Mr. HEFLIN. That is so, and I would like to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. WALSH. Well, Mr. Speaker, I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Cravens, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 183. An act providing additional time for the payment of purchase money under homestead entries of lands within the former Fort Peck Indian Reservation, Mont.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 183. An act providing additional time for the payment of purchase money under homestead entries of lands within the former Fort Peck Indian Reservation, Mont.; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

NEAR EAST RELIEF.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Chair to lay before the House the bill S. 180, a similar bill being on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the bill S. 180, a similar bill having been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary of the House.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, before that is done I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a point of order. I am willing to reserve the point of order.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I would like to have the gentleman state his point of order.

Mr. CRAMTON. I also reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is not asking unanimous consent.

Mr. CRAMTON. I did not hear the gentleman's request then.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. It is a Senate bill on the Speaker's table, and a similar bill being on the House Calendar I ask that the Senate bill be laid before the House and put upon its passage.

Mr. CRAMTON. The point I desire to make is that the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is based on the rule which provides that this procedure may obtain where a similar bill has first been reported from the House committee, which was not true in this case.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has made inquiry and is informed that that is the fact, that it was reported and by the parliamentary clerk referred to the calendar before the Senate bill came over.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. That is the fact.

Mr. CRAMTON. The bill which I have in my hand, and upon which I have depended, shows that the House bill was referred to the House Calendar on July 15. That appears in the print of H. R. 412, which I have in my hand.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. When was the Senate bill brought over?

Mr. WALSH. On the same day.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Is it not true that the House bill came from the Committee on the Judiciary and was received at the Speaker's desk before the Senate bill was passed?

Mr. CRAMTON. That is a question of fact on which I will yield to the statement——

Mr. GARD. My information is that it was.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the Senate bill came over on July 15 and that before the Senate bill came over this bill was referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. MADDEN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it within the rule of the House for a gentleman to rise in his place any day in the week on a matter that is not privileged and ask that a certain bill on the Speaker's table be placed before the House for consideration? Does it not require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It does not require unanimous consent.

Mr. MADDEN. The Chair rules that the mere fact that the bill comes from the Senate gives it a privilege without respect to whether we are calling committees or not, a privilege that the House bill does not enjoy.

The SPEAKER. It has this privilege, that when the House committee has reported a similar bill the Senate bill is privileged, the theory being that it is to expedite business; that the Senate having passed the bill and the House committee having reported the bill, the bill is privileged.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This bill is on the House Calendar as reported from the Committee on the Judiciary. Is that the bill that is now called up for consideration?

The SPEAKER. The rule requires that it be substantially the same bill. The Chair has not examined it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The bills are identical, the House bill and the Senate bill.

Mr. MADDEN. A further parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MADDEN. If there was no Senate bill, and the House bill was on the calendar, would it be privileged to call up the House bill at this time?

The SPEAKER. It would not.

Mr. MADDEN. What is there in the Senate bill which gives it a privilege which the House bill does not enjoy?

The SPEAKER. Section 2 of Rule XXIV gives the bill that privilege.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, if this bill is to come up, what provision is there for debate and amendment?

The SPEAKER. It will be considered under the regular rules of the House. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], having charge of the bill, will have an hour, and unless he moves the previous question within the hour the bill would be before the House as any other bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to state what his purpose is in respect to debate? Does he intend to move the previous question after he has used his hour?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I had no idea that there would be any opposition to this bill, which is very simple in its character and which does not affect any public question. It is a bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary to incorporate a charity that is doing a great work, that can not be done by anyone else, in the Near East.

Mr. CRAMTON. In its present form I shall be obliged to oppose the bill, and would like some time.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I simply ask for fair play in the consideration of the bill, and it is not my purpose to shut off anyone who wants to legitimately debate the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. But who is going to decide whether the debate is legitimate? The gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. To some extent.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think that is a fair statement of the case.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, is not the question of consideration now in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania raises the question of consideration. The question is, Shall the House now consider the bill?

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania) there were—ayes 87, noes 19.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas, that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 16, noes 110.

So the motion to adjourn was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Obviously there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors; the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees. The question is, Shall the House consider the bill? Those in favor will, as their names are called, answer "aye"; those opposed, "no." The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll; and there were—yeas 276, nays 75, answered "present" 3, not voting 76, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors. The Clerk will report the bill.

An act (S. 180) to incorporate Near East Relief.

Be it enacted, etc., That the following persons, namely, James L. Barton, Cleveland H. Dodge, Henry Morgenthau, Edwin M. Bulkley, Alexander J. Hemphill, Charles R. Crane, William Howard Taft, Charles Evans Hughes, Elihu Root, Abram I. Elkus, Charles W. Eliot, Harry Pratt Judson, Charles E. Beury, Arthur J. Brown, John B. Calvert, William I. Chamberlain, Robert J. Cuddihy, Cleveland E. Dodge, William T. Ellis, James Cardinal Gibbons, David H. Greer, Harold A. Hatch, William I. Haven, Myron T. Herrick, Hamilton Holt, Frank W. Jackson, Arthur Curtiss James, Frederick Lynch, Vance C. McCormick, Charles S. Macfarland, Henry B. F. Macfarland, William B. Millar, John R. Mott, Frank Mason North, George A. Plimpton, Philip Rhinelander, William Jay Schieffelin, George T. Scott, Albert Shaw, William Sloane, Edward Lincoln Smith, Robert Eliot Speer, James M. Speers, Oscar S. Straus, Charles V. Vickrey, Harry A. Wheeler, Stanley White, Ray Lyman Wilbur, Talcott Williams, and Stephen S. Wise, their associates and successors duly chosen, are hereby incorporated and declared to be a body corporate of the District of Columbia by the name of Near East Relief and by that name shall be known and have perpetual succession, with the powers, limitations, and restrictions herein contained.

SEC. 2. That the object for which said corporation is incorporated shall be to provide relief and to assist in the repatriation, rehabilitation, and reestablishment of suffering and dependent people of the Near East and adjacent areas; to provide for the care of orphans and widows and to promote the social, economic, and industrial welfare of those who have been rendered destitute, or dependent directly or indirectly, by the vicissitudes of war, the cruelties of men, or other causes beyond their control.

SEC. 3. That the direction and management of the affairs of the corporation, and the control of its property and funds, shall be vested in a board of trustees, to be composed of the following individuals: James L. Barton, Cleveland H. Dodge, Henry Morgenthau, Edwin M. Bulkley, Alexander J. Hemphill, Charles R. Crane, William Howard Taft, Charles Evans Hughes, Elihu Root, Abram I. Elkus, Charles W. Eliot, Harry Pratt Judson, Charles E. Beury, Arthur J. Brown, John B. Calvert, William I. Chamberlain, Robert J. Cuddihy, Cleveland E. Dodge, William T. Ellis, James Cardinal Gibbons, David H. Greer, Harold A. Hatch, William I. Haven, Myron T. Herrick, Hamilton Holt, Frank W. Jackson, Arthur Curtiss James, Frederick Lynch, Vance C. McCormick, Charles S. Macfarland, Henry B. F. Macfarland, William B. Millar, John R. Mott, Frank Mason North, George A. Plimpton, Philip Rhinelander, William Jay Schieffelin, George T. Scott, Albert Shaw, William Sloane, Edward Lincoln Smith, Robert Eliot Speer, James M. Speers, Oscar S. Straus, Charles V. Vickrey, Harry A. Wheeler, Stanley White, Ray Lyman Wilbur, Talcott Williams, and Stephen S. Wise, who shall constitute the first board of trustees and constitute the members of the corporation. Vacancies occurring by death, resignation, or otherwise shall be filled by the remaining trustees in such manner as the by-laws shall prescribe, and the persons so elected shall thereupon become trustees and also members of the corporation.

SEC. 4. That the principal office of the corporation shall be located in the District of Columbia, but offices may be maintained and meetings of the corporation or of the trustees and committees may be held in other places, such as the by-laws may from time to time fix.

SEC. 5. That the said trustees shall be entitled to take, hold, and administer any securities, funds, or property which may be transferred to them for the purposes and objects hereinbefore enumerated by the existing and unincorporated American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, and such other funds or property as may at any time be given, devised, or bequeathed to them or to such corporation, for the purposes of the trust; with full power from time to time to adopt a common seal, to appoint officers, whether members of the board of trustees or otherwise, and such employees as may be deemed necessary for carrying on the business of the corporation, and at such salaries or with such remuneration as they may think proper; and full power to adopt by-laws and such rules or regulations as may be necessary to secure the safe and convenient transaction of the business of the corporation.

SEC. 6. That as soon as may be possible after the passage of this act a meeting of the trustees hereinbefore named shall be called by Cleveland H. Dodge, Henry Morgenthau, Abram I. Elkus, Edwin M. Bulkley, Alexander J. Hemphill, Williar B. Millar, George T. Scott, James L. Barton, and Charles V. Vickrey, or any six of them, at the borough of Manhattan, in the city of New York, by notice served in person or by mail, addressed to each trustee at his place of residence; and the said trustees named herein, or a majority thereof, being assembled, shall organize and proceed to adopt by-laws, to elect officers, and generally to organize the said corporation.

SEC. 7. That a meeting of the incorporators, their associates, or successors shall be held once in every year after the year of incorporation at such time and place as shall be prescribed in the by-laws, when the annual reports of the officers and executive boards shall be presented and members of the executive board elected for the ensuing year. Special meetings of the corporation may be called upon such notice as may be prescribed.

SEC. 8. That a copy of the constitution and by-laws and of all amendments thereto shall be filed with the Congress when adopted, and on or before the 1st day of April each year said corporation shall make and transmit to the Congress a report of its proceedings for the year ending December 31 preceding, including in such report the names and residences of its officers, and a full and itemized account of all receipts and expenditures.

SEC. 9. That the corporation shall have no power to issue certificates of stock or declare or pay any dividends, or otherwise distribute to its members any of its property, or the proceeds therefrom, or from its operations. On dissolution of the corporation otherwise than by act of Congress the property shall escheat to the United States.

SEC. 10. That all members and officers of the corporation and of its governing body may reside in or be citizens of any place within the United States.

SEC. 11. That the franchise herein granted shall terminate at the expiration of 25 years from the date of the approval of the act; and that Congress reserves the right to repeal, alter, or amend this act at any time.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a point of order. This is a very important bill, in my judgment, and there ought to be a quorum of the House present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order there is no quorum present, and obviously no quorum is present.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 59, noes none.

So the call was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Anthony	Freeman	Kennedy, Iowa	Purnell

Frear	Kelley, Mich.	Paige

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and thirty-five Members have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I am going to consume 10 minutes——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has one hour.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I understand, but I am going to stop at the end of 10 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, Senate bill No. 180, which is before the House on its passage, is exactly identical with the bill H. R. 412. The bill H. R. 412 was reported favorably from the Committee on the Judiciary of this House recommending its passage without any amendment made to it in the committee. The reason for that I may explain to my colleagues is this: In the last House a bill exactly similar to this, I mean a bill for the same object as this, was presented and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. That committee, which, may I say, is opposed generally to a United States incorporation and never recommends them unless there are some special reasons to commend such a course—that committee pruned and amended the bill as it was introduced at great length, and then with those amendments the bill was reported back to the House, and my colleague, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD], was placed in charge of it, but it was not reached. Now, before this House the present bill, H. R. 412, was presented by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE], and it contains every one of the amendments which the Committee on the Judiciary said ought to be put in this bill. Therefore when it was before our committee for consideration at this time it had no need to be amended, for the new bill contains every one of the amendments which had been proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary to the last House. It was not reached in the last House, because of pressure of other business and the Judiciary Committee not having an opportunity to be heard. Now, what is this bill, gentlemen? A very simple proposition. It is a proposition to incorporate the gentlemen whose names have been read, who at present constitute the American Relief Committee that is dispensing charity in the Near East—in Armenia, in Syria, and in those portions of the East that were under the dominion of Turkey, and I wish to say to the House that it was satisfactorily shown to our committee that there was no other instrumentality working in that district. The Red Cross, as the report shows, was operating through this American Relief Committee, and distributed through that source probably $2,000,000. I need not say to the House that the cry that comes up from that country is a most pathetic and distressing one. I need not say to the House that any man who is imbued with the slightest feeling of humanity ought to be interested in helping to promote and care for those people who in that territory have suffered the tortures of the damned. Millions of them have been destroyed, and millions more are living in absolute destitution.

This bill is asked to be passed solely and only for the purpose of putting this committee on a higher plane in administering this charity in those countries where the people know nothing of our divisions of States and districts, but look only to the idea of the United States of America, and with the imprimatur of Congress on them as a corporation it gives them a recognition that otherwise they would not possess. They do not dispense only the alms or the charity that is provided for in this country, but they get contributions from those who have already felt the tortures there. Out of the sympathy coming from their hearts for their fellow creatures around them these poor people out there contribute money to the American Relief Committee for the purpose of having it distributed properly among the needy, the destitute, and the suffering.

I can not imagine why there should be objection to the passage of this bill. As our committee said in its report:

> The Committee on the Judiciary has been disposed to favor the granting of the incorporation for the purposes enumerated in the bill herein reported on for the reason that the Near East Relief has been doing a magnificent work among destitute peoples and are now actually upon the ground affording relief of the most direct and important kind, and, inasmuch as there are many matters to be taken up with the peoples they are seeking to help, it is apparent that the corporation extending relief having the dignity of approval by an act of Congress would be more easily and readily understood and given proper credit than if the incorporation had limited or State approval.
> Recognizing the true principle to be that the granting and approval of articles of incorporation by Congress should be very infrequently granted, the committee is of opinion that this is one case where a great good may be accomplished thereby to suffering peoples.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. By request of the chairman of the committee, I was asked to take charge of this measure before the House, and I am simply performing my duty as a member of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does this bill take any money out of the United States Treasury at all?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. None at all.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does it grant these people the franking privilege?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. It does not. And furthermore it provides that all the expenses of running this charity must be paid out of the pockets of the people who are incorporated, and not one penny of the money contributed to charity can be used for the payment of the expenses of the corporation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is there anything in this bill to give this corporation trading privileges?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. We thought there was in the first bill, and carefully excluded it, and there is nothing in this bill that would enable them to indulge in any sort of trading operations.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Is there anything in this bill that would authorize this corporation to use the congressional action as a means for "drives" and collections of money under this proposition?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Nothing except the fact that it has that dignity and status that would make its credit with these people both for receiving alms or charity which they might contribute and which they would be entitled to receive.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has consumed 10½ minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I will take another half minute to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. BEE. I would like to ask this question: Why, in section 11, do you provide that the life of the franchise shall terminate in 25 years? What will be the necessity, in other words, for the continuance of the charity to these unfortunate people beyond a year or so?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The idea was to put in a limit, so that it should not be a perpetual charter, and that was all. And we made the limit large enough to cover. When the work stops, of course, this corporation will terminate and wind up its affairs. It must report every year to Congress, and it must pay over to Congress every dollar of money already appropriated which it has in its possession at the time.

Mr. BEE. I just wanted to ask one more question, and I will not pursue the inquiry further. Would this terminate by congressional action or by voluntary action on the part of the corporation?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I presume by voluntary action.

Mr. BEE. Any not by congressional action.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman suggest the section in the bill which places the restriction on the expenditure of the funds to the corporation to which the gentleman has referred?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I will not at this time, but——

Mr. CRAMTON. I will be glad to have you do it at any time.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. My time has expired.

Mr. WALSH. I would like my colleague on the committee to give his interpretation of the phrase "to promote the industrial welfare of those who have been rendered destitute." Does that mean engage in business over there?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Not at all. By enabling people to become self-supporting over there, which is perfectly legitimate, and not a corporation engaging in trade.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. For the purpose of information I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania the procedure of the winding up of the corporation incorporated under the laws of Congress under such congressional action as this corporation. Suppose at the expiration of 25 years it shall have half a million dollars in its treasury, to whom is the accounting made in winding up the corporation?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. To Congress. The money goes to the United States. That is in the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes; certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that this incorporation or the gentlemen who were to be incorporated under this bill were not permitted to spend any part of the money received as contributions for the management of the affairs of the corporation. I do not see any such language as that in the bill. On the contrary, it does say, in section 5, that they are permitted, in carrying on the business of the incorporation, to pay such salaries or remunerations and employ such people as they may think proper. And I assume that is to be paid out of the contributions.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. That is the same question that another gentleman asked.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman has not answered it, however. The gentleman makes the statement, however, to the House——

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Listen and I will answer your questions. Wait until I have finished and then address me if you want to know something else. I did make that statement. Before our committee it was made perfectly clear that that was the course pursued by this American committee. Now, I will refer to the bill itself and be glad to make any further statement on this subject.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to know in what part of the bill the provision is made that the gentleman refers to.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not yield the floor. I am going to yield five minutes of time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], who is in opposition to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, can I have that time extended if it should be necessary?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. If I have the time, I shall be glad to.

Mr. CANNON. Let me say—and I hope it will not come out of the gentleman's time—after you consume the hour I think those who wish to discuss it further should have time. It seems to me this bill is of enough importance to receive two hours' consideration.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there be on this bill two hours of general debate, including the time already consumed, one hour of which shall be controlled by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] and the other hour by any member of the Committee on the Judiciary who is opposed to the bill, if there be any; and, if not, by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that there shall be two hours of general debate, one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] and the other by some member of the Committee on the Judiciary who is opposed to the bill or, if not, by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. The time for debate not being limited under the rule, if this unanimous consent is agreed to would the time for debate on this bill then be limited to two hours?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that would be a fair interpretation of it.

Mr. MANN. At the end of two hours it would be the same as if the previous question were ordered?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not suggest that. The Chair thinks that ought to be included.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If that is to be coupled with the request, I shall object to the unanimous consent.

Mr. CRAMTON. The yielding of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], unless it were extended somewhat, would not appear to me to be a very liberal allotment of time.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I have one hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] has one hour, and after that, unless the previous question is moved, anyone obtaining the floor could address the House.

Mr. CANNON. There is to be one hour to a side, and then the previous question is to be ordered?

Mr. CRAMTON. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania will move the previous question at the end of his hour.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that somebody might want to offer an amendment to this bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. I understand there is to be no such opportunity.

Mr. MANN. There is no such thing as general debate on this bill apart from any other debate.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know; but if you order the previous question at the end of two hours, it shuts out the opportunity for amendment.

Mr. MANN. It would offer the opportunity for amendment during the two hours to anybody who got the floor by right.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Suppose one gentleman gets the floor and holds it for an hour and then another gentleman gets the floor and holds it for another hour?

Mr. MANN. Then nobody would get it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If that is the case, I shall have to object.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri object?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I extend the gentleman's time to 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania extends the time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] to 10 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. One further question: Does the gentleman propose to move the previous question at the end of the hour?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I shall feel justified in moving the previous question at the end of the hour, for the reason that the consideration of this bill has been met by every technical objection you gentlemen could devise.

Mr. CANNON. When you say "You gentlemen "——

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. When it has been sufficiently discussed, so that you gentlemen will know exactly what it is, I shall move the previous question.

Mr. CANNON. Then we will antagonize the previous question. I have read this bill to-day for the first time.

Mr. MANN. My colleague should have read it in the previous Congress. It has been pending here since the last Congress.

Mr. CANNON. It should be read in the Committee of the Whole. It makes a charge on the Public Treasury.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point of no quorum.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that the House do now adjourn. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks for the yeas and nays. Those who favor taking the vote by yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Thirty-two gentlemen have risen—a sufficient number—and the yeas and nays are ordered.

Mr. WALSH. I ask for the other side.

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary. There is a fifth of those present.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What right had the Member from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to make the motion unless the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] yielded the floor? The Chair had recognized the gentleman from Michigan, and he was then upon the floor.

Mr. WALSH. A point of no quorum was made.

The SPEAKER. Yes; a point of no quorum was made.

Mr. MONTAGUE. But that was not the motion to adjourn. I am asking about the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that the motion to adjourn is not in order when the gentleman from Michigan was on the floor and recognized.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was taken from the floor by the point of no quorum, and while that was pending the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] moved to adjourn.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I demanded the regular order, and thereupon the Speaker recognized the gentleman from Michigan.

The SPEAKER. And thereupon the point of no quorum was made. Those who favor the motion to adjourn will answer "aye" when their names are called; those opposed will answer "no." The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 98, nays 220, answered "present" 1, not voting 111, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire how much time I have used?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used 15 minutes. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] will proceed.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, the bill before us is at least ostensibly a bill to incorporate for Near East relief. As such I am sure the bill must be a popular one with Members of Congress, because it purports to be for charity and for charity a long way from home. Hence it will be peculiarly appealing to us. But, gentlemen, the question of charity might very quickly be dismissed from our minds, for the reason that in order to accomplish every charitable purpose that any of these gentlemen desire they could months ago when they started their campaign have secured an incorporation in practically any State in the Union. But the reason they do not choose to do that should be the reason why this Congress will refuse to give them the special Federal charter they seek. Special charters of incorporation have been frowned upon by States and the Federal Government for many years, because of their unpleasant experience of the danger from special acts of incorporation, the danger that very able men, knowing just what they want, frame a bill that may not have the real purpose upon its surface, but may have it concealed in some vague language that would not be noted by the lawmaking body.

I would not presume to venture an opinion as to the constitutionality of this act or venture to attack its constitutionality, coming from the Committee on the Judiciary and having been framed in behalf of an organization that has in its membership so many eminent corporation lawyers as does this bill. But I may at least suggest for your consideration that under the Constitution the Congress of the United States has the power to grant an act of incorporation only for the purposes specified; that is, it is only to assist in carrying into effect powers expressly granted by the Constitution to Congress that there has been inferred the authority to grant a charter of incorporation.

The one most common is a corporation to engage in interstate commerce, which is inferred from the interstate-commerce clause, but it has been expressly stated that the purpose of this corporation is not for industrial purposes or to engage in commerce. This corporation act if sustained at all must be sustained in connection with the power of Congress to govern the District of Columbia. All this bill has to do with the District of Columbia is in section 4, where it provides that the principal office of this corporation shall be in the District. It does not provide that the only office shall be in the District, it does not provide that any single officer or employee shall live in the District, it does not provide that any officer shall actually be in the principal office, it does not provide that the meetings shall be in the District. It is only a subterfuge.

That eminent gentleman, Mr. Roland Carlisle Heisler, connected with the University of Pennsylvania, says in his work on Federal Incorporation, pages 25 and 26:

> But if Congress should abuse this power * * * the remedy would lie in the hands of the Supreme Court. That tribunal will not question the motives of Congress when an act is a clear exercise of an express power, but the purpose or end of the legislation in question will be investigated to determine if it is actually within the express power. The mere fact that Congress declares that the end is within an express power will not prevent the court from questioning this, and if the real purpose is to reach subjects which are beyond the power of Congress the act will be declared unconstitutional.

But, anyway, if it may be sustained as within the letter of the Constitution, it is not within the spirit. There is no reason for incorporating this organization in the District of Columba, no good reason that should appeal to Congress.

Now, in the very brief time that I have, and I am sorry that debate is to be so brief, let me call to your attention some of the provisions of this special charter; and I am willing to confess to the House that I am not a constitutional expert nor am I a corporation lawyer. I can not claim to point out all the real weaknesses inside the bill drawn for a corporation to be made up of gentlemen like Elihu Root and Charles Evans Hughes and other distinguished lawyers.

It is said to be in order to let certain philanthropic gentlemen in this country organize for the benefit of charity to be administered in the Near East—that is, an east that is very far from here. Section 2 states:

> The object for which said incorporation is incorporated shall be to provide relief and to assist in the repatriation, rehabilitation, and reestablishment of suffering—

And so forth.

And then, after that, comes language which has no connection whatever with the Near East, but is as broad as language can make it—these gentleman can administer charity the world over.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I will yield to the gentleman, for the gentleman can give me additional time.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Does not section 2 say the suffering dependents in the Near East?

Mr. CRAMTON. I did not read all that, but I will admit that the first part relates to the Near East, but the other part has no connection whatever with the Near East.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Referring to section 2, does it not provide the object——

Mr. CRAMTON. It consists in the repatriation, the rehabilitation, and reestablishment of suffering——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And repatriation means——

Mr. CRAMTON. The taking of the Armenians back to Armenia.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is indulging in repatriation in foreign countries.

Mr. CRAMTON. Note how broad this language is. It has no connection with the first part of the paragraph. It says:

> To provide for the care of orphans and widows and to promote the social, economic, and industrial welfare of those who have been rendered destitute, or dependent, directly or indirectly, by the vicissitudes of war, the cruelties of men, or other causes beyond their control.

There is no limitation to the Near East. Every man or woman or child who has been rendered helpless from "causes beyond their control" is within the ken of the charity of Mr. Root and Mr. Hughes and these other distinguished philanthropists. Furthermore, we form this organization of distinguished gentlemen, and it becomes perpetual, self-continuing. Vacancies are filled by appointment by the trustees. We may be interested in charity in the Near East, we may be interested in charity the world over, as section 2 provides——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield me five minutes more.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. CRAMTON. We should be interested in determining whether some gentlemen are securing here a charter that even if they execute properly in years to come may grow to be a gigantic corporation, with millions of wealth in its hands, which might be used for sinister purposes in this country. We have refused this privilege to Carnegie and to Rockefeller, and why should we give it to any men in such broad and unguarded language? Let me call your attention further to the provisions of the bill. Let us take the matter of the annual report, which, apparently, might not be important. Section 8 authorizes them to file their report with Congress, and I am advised by the best authorities about this House that this carries with it the privilege of having the report printed by the Government, and then it goes under the franking privilege. Section 10 provides—

> That all members and officers of the corporation and of its governing body may reside in or be citizens of any place within the United States.

They do not have to be residents of the United States. These gentlemen do not have to be citizens of the United States. These gentlemen may, any or all, in the time to come in the future be citizens of any foreign country, but the Congress of the United States will have given to them a Federal charter under which they may engage upon such visionary schemes as section 2 provides for.

I appeal to this House not to be carried away by their natural feelings of sympathy for charity, their natural desire to promote it; but, instead, they should look at this as a hard business proposition, realizing that these men can get a charter anywhere, but that for some reason known to themselves they desire to come to Congress and get a special act.

It will be noticed that there is no Armenian on this list of directors. And could it be possible that some organization might be formed of distinguished men, philanthropists though they may be, but who are also incidentally corporation lawyers and great corporation leaders, captains of industry, seeking commercial advantages in the Far East or in the Near East, and giving out in connection with the Federal incorporation an idea to the people of that section of the world that they represent in some way the Government of the United States, who in the bestowal of their relief might acquire for themselves a standing and a prestige that would result in some way to their own pecuniary advantage or the advantage of their corporation, the securing of concessions? I thank the gentleman for his extension of time, and yield back the remainder of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE].

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] has asked this House not to be carried away by appeals to sympathy and charity. I retort by asking that the gentlemen of the House be not carried away by appeals inciting prejudice to the individual incorporators of this institution. I think it is obvious that some of the opposition to this bill, and I am not attributing it to the gentleman from Michigan, is based upon unconscious dislike of some of the incorporators of this charter. I submit to the House that this is a very narrow view and one in no way pertinent in determining our vote.

The gentleman says that this is a perpetual charter. On the face of the bill it is limited to 25 years. And in the character of the enterprise it can hardly last more than a few years, for the charity, by the very nature of its undertaking, must end in a brief period. The gentleman says it is not charitable, because no charter has been heretofore applied for from any of the States. I submit that this is a non sequitur. The reason for this charter is very simple. Conditions and not theories, to use an old expression, now confront us. We are dealing with a temperament of the peoples of that eastern country, and not only temperaments, but their lack of knowledge of the affairs of this country. To go before these people in administering this great charity with a charter from New York, Pennsylvania, or Ohio would convey little significance or impression, but if it has the sanction of the Congress of the United States such a charter at once facilitates their negotiations, both in governmental and business relations. If its agents go to a bank or to a government official in relation to this charity, and do not have a national charter, they would have to have in all probability additional and elaborate credentials, and with the eastern mind full of doubts and misgivings, in the absence of such supporting documents, the whole business negotiations might be delayed or nullified.

Therefore the charter is simply to better administer this charity. And it is charity, gentlemen. I make no disguise about it. It would never have enlisted my support for an instant if it were not a charity, a clean charity in origin and purpose and object. [Applause.]

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will.

Mr. BEGG. On page 2, line 18, would the gentleman be willing to incorporate the word "charity," following the word "provide," and cut out, beginning after the word "widows," all down to the word "welfare"?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I personally would be willing to accept any amendment that would confine it beyond question to charity.

Mr. BEGG. Then, do I understand we will have an opportunity to introduce amendments?

Mr. MONTAGUE. But the status of this bill is such that if you delay the bill now and do not take the Senate bill you need not act at all. Time is now a vital thing.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield for one further question? Will that delay it by introducing amendments?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think so, because the bill would have to go back to the Senate, and unless this bill can be passed within the next 24 hours I understand it is of no need.

Mr. BEGG. Is the gentleman asking this Congress to swallow it whole, without any opportunity of debate or discussion or of safeguarding it in any way? Does the gentleman think that is the thing to do?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am not asking Congress to do any such thing, and the gentleman ought to be quite well aware that I am not doing it.

Mr. BEGG. Well——

Mr. MONTAGUE. Let me answer the gentleman. I am asking the Congress to take a bill that has been reported by two committees of this House at the last session, namely, the Committee on the District of Columbia and the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BEGG. But there is no opportunity——

Mr. MONTAGUE. Wait a minute. The same bill is again reported by the Committee on the Judiciary of this House, and this same bill has been reported unanimously by the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate and passed unanimously by the Senate. Am I trying to ram a bill down anybody's throat that comes to this House with such an imprimatur and such considered action? [Applause.]

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman permit one more question?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will.

Mr. BEGG. The gentleman appreciates there are about 60 of us here who never heard that debate and have had no opportunity of hearing anything of this debate, only by the advocates of this bill.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I appreciate that.

Mr. BEGG. We appreciate it, too.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And I am very sorry to see gentlemen in that attitude; but if the circumstances are such as to limit their knowledge upon this question, it is no reason that this charity should be withheld from millions of starving and suffering people. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will.

Mr. CRAMTON. I would like to ask the gentleman the reason why this bill, which has been pending now for a year or two, must pass within 24 hours or be of no use?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Because the gentlemen are to sail.

Mr. CRAMTON. I beg the gentleman's pardon, I did not understand him.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I say the gentlemen who are to take this charter abroad are to sail in the next day or two, and they wish to carry the charter.

Mr. CRAMTON. Sail on an act of Congress?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Oh, no; but they wish to have the Congress facilitate them, otherwise they will be deprived of a great advantage.

Mr. CRAMTON. Could they not have gotten a State charter six months ago in many of the States?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am opposed, as a general proposition, to national incorporations. There is not a man in this House who is more opposed than I am to cluttering up the proceedings of this Congress with national incorporations, but I am not so narrow that I can not see exceptions to the general rule. I submit that in the history of this world there never has been among the same number of people so much misery, so much suffering, so much sorrow, and so much starvation as there has been in Syria, Armenia, and contiguous territory. Why, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] spoke of repatriation as if that should exclude consideration of this bill. What is meant by repatriation? Simply to bring these widows and children back to their own homes from the contiguous and other territory into which they have been so ruthlessly driven. Repatriation is not sinister; it is holy.

Mr. BLACKMON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BLACKMON. Does not my friend think that charity should begin at home, and that before granting these Federal corporations in a foreign sense we should look after the immense suffering in this country?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will say to the gentleman that I do believe in charity beginning at home, but if the gentleman's argument is right he would blot out every foreign missionary society in the world. Two lights will not put out each other. The more light for these suffering people the more for home and for mankind. [Applause.]

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will.

Mr. FOSTER. I am one of these freshmen. I would like to know why this charity can not be exercised under the American Red Cross, that I thought had an international reputation?

Mr. MONTAGUE. There is no advocate of this incorporation more sympathetic than the American Red Cross.

Mr. FOSTER. That does not answer my question. Why should we incorporate this rather than to put it through the Red Cross?

Mr. MONTAGUE. It now has more than it can do, and it favors this incorporation.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I will answer the gentleman from Ohio. The reason is this: That the Red Cross has no agencies through that territory, and the Red Cross has given its money to this agency to distribute in that area.

Mr. FOSTER. This is the only case that did not come to the Red Cross, as I happen to know as an official of it, in the last two years.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. You are not well informed.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I am better informed on that proposition than the gentleman thinks I am.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Let me answer this question before you make it.

Mr. DEWALT. Let me repeat——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] makes the point that no quorum is present. It is clear that no quorum is present.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I move a call of the House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, had the Speaker announced that there was no quorum present?

The SPEAKER. The Speaker had so announced. The vote is on the call of the House.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MADDEN. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 69, noes 26.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. A call of the House is ordered. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Anthony	Evans, Mont.	Langley	Rouse
Ashbrook	Fairfield	Lazaro	Rowan

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and two gentlemen have answered to their names.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota moves that the House do now adjourn. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 105, noes 88.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks for the yeas and nays. Those in favor of taking the vote by the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Forty-six gentlemen—a sufficient number—have risen.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. Those in favor of the motion to adjourn will, when their names are called, answer "aye"; those opposed will answer "no." The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 147, nays 138, answered "present" 1, not voting 144, as follows:

So the motion to adjourn was agreed to.

Before the announcement of the vote,

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, in view of the unsettled condition of affairs in the city, and the anxiety of some Members to be at home with their families, I change my vote from "nay" to "yea."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must not debate it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be recorded "present."

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present and listening when his name was called?

Mr. BLANTON. I was not in the Hall, but I should like to be recorded "present" under the precedent in the last Congress.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no authority to do that.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not make a parliamentary inquiry during a roll call.

Mr. BLANTON. May I make a point of order?

The SPEAKER. No; not during a roll call.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Wednesday, July 23, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington, from the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6750) to deport certain undersirable aliens and to deny readmission to those deported, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 143), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, July 23, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come before Thee as representatives of this great Nation pledged to justice and peace. We deplore the expression of bitterness and hate that has disgraced the streets of our National Capital in the last few days. We thank Thee that this is the exhibition of but the smallest fraction of the great multitude of Thy people in this country of ours, who love justice and right. We pray that Thou wilt strengthen the arm of the law, that Thou wilt give the hand of justice to those who deal with lawbreakers, that Thou wilt guide and protect those who defend the rights and liberties of the people. Do Thou bring out of these expressions that arise a deeper sense of our dependence upon God and of our league with Thee for the establishment of peace in all the earth. We ask it for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

FOREST FIRES IN IDAHO.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, which will be read.

The communication was read and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, July 22, 1919.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Forest fires of unusual intensity and extent prevail in Idaho. Some of these are on the unreserved public lands, while some are on forest reserves and some on private lands. I have authorized Mr. Tallman, the Commissioner of Public Lands, to draw upon the moneys appropriated for the field service in the Land Office for funds with which to fight these fires. This is a matter of the gravest emergency, and already we have specifically alloted $40,000 for this work; but this will be quite insufficient. It seems to me a matter of such vital importance that I take the liberty of suggesting that a joint resolution should be passed through both Houses authorizing an expenditure up to the amount of $500,000, which should contain an authorization for the reimbursement of the field-service fund, which was not intended by Congress for any such purpose except perhaps in some very minor amount. The latest word from our agents in Idaho is that all that can be done is to keep the fires from spreading over a much wider territory and that they can not be extinguished save by a heavy rain, of which there is no immediate prospect.

Cordially, yours, FRANKLIN K. LANE.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

ISSUANCE OF RAILROAD PASSES (S. DOC. NO. 57).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Director General of Railroads, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 8th instant, information relative to the issuance of annual all-line railroad sleeping-car, parlor-car, and dining-car passes issued during the period of Federal control, which will be printed and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. NEWBERRY. The communication just laid before the Senate by the Chair is in response to a resolution offered by myself, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The communication is as follows:

UNITED STATES RAILROAD ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, July 22, 1919.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: With regard to the resolution adopted by the Senate on July 8, calling upon the Director General of Railroads to report certain facts in connection with annual all-line railroad sleeping-car, parlor-car, and dining-car passes issued during the period of Federal control, preparation of facts desired was begun immediately upon receipt of the resolution. In view of the detailed nature of the information requested, the facts can not be presented immediately, but pending a complete report, I thought I should submit to the Senate the facts along general lines.

No passes are issued for free dining-car service.

In issuing passes good on railroads under Federal operation and good for sleeping-car and parlor-car accommodations, the Railroad Administration has been guided by the established practices which had been adopted under private control in conformity with the provisions adopted by Congress in the interstate commerce act and in amendments thereto, governing the matter of free passes.

Under private control, it was the general practice for the principal railroad officers to have annual passes on their own railroads and in addition to obtain exchange passes from practically all other railroads in the country, so far as they might be applied for. The result was that each of these general railroad officers had a large number of annual passes covering most of the important mileage in the country. In addition the chief managing officers very frequently had annual Pullman passes good on all Pullman lines in the United States. The officers who had annual passes for themselves on the railroads generally also had annual railroad and Pullman passes for the dependent members of their families, or could and did obtain trip passes as a matter of course upon request.

The general policy of the Railroad Administration was to take these established practices as its standard and on that basis to give passes good on all lines only on account of representatives of the central administration and on account of such railroad officers as had customarily had available to them annual passes good on practically all mileage under Federal control.

Annual passes good over all lines have been issued broadly to the following classes of persons:

Officials of the central administration which, of course, has jurisdiction over all lines.

The seven regional directors and the principal members of their staffs.

The Federal managers of the various railroads and other officials who under private control had at their disposal passes on any line desired, such officers under private control having, generally speaking, held exchange passes over practically all railroads in the United States, or over all such railroads might be included in their request for passes.

The chief executives of the railroad corporations (including the chief officers of the Association of Railroad Executives and the secretary of the American Railroad Association), such chief executives having had under private control passes over all railroads, or over such railroads as they might include in their requests therefor.

Dependent members of the families of the foregoing persons.

The chief officers of the American Short Line Association, Western Railroad Association, Railway Accounting Officers' Association, Association of Transportation and Car Accounting Officers, and Association of Western Railroads.

Nearly 98 per cent of the all-line passes issued by the Railroad Administration are restricted so as not to be good on certain specified limited trains.

Pullman passes good on all lines have been issued, broadly, to many members of the same classes mentioned above.

All-line railroad passes have been issued by the Railroad Administration to 4,114 persons during the period of Federal control, of which 119 have been canceled in the regular order of business, leaving 3,995 outstanding on July 1, 1919; all-line Pullman passes have been issued to 2,418 persons by the Railroad Administration during Federal control, of which 515 have been canceled, leaving 1,903 outstanding on July 1, 1919. All of these passes have been issued in accordance with the foregoing standards.

Sincerely, yours,

WALKER D. HINES,
Director General of Railroads.

GENERAL STAFF CORPS—MEDALS OF HONOR (S. DOC. NO. 58).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 14th instant, copies of all reports, memoranda, etc., on file or of record in Washington, D. C., under the control of the War Department and relate to the interpretation and execution of the provisions of section 5 and of section 122 of the national-defense act, approved June 3, 1916, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MOSES presented a petition of Mechanic Lodge, No. 23, International Order of Good Templars, of East Weare, N. H., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the enforcement of war-time and national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Milan, Madbury, Hollis, Chichester, Strafford, and New Durham, all in the State of New Hampshire, praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SPENCER. I present two telegrams, one from the Grand Lodge, Knights of Pythias, of Missouri, and the other from the St. Louis Branch, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, in regard to the mob riots in this city. I ask that they be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ST. LOUIS, MO., July 22, 1919.

Hon. SELDEN P. SPENCER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Grand Lodge, Knights of Pythias, of Missouri, in convention assembled, representing 15,000 members, citizens from all parts of Missouri, protests against the shameful and lawless actions by mobs of civilians and soldiers, disgracing the Capital of the Nation by the slaughter of negro citizens. We urge you as a representative of the people of Missouri, in the name of humanity, justice, freedom, and security, to invoke the power of the Government to stop this lawlessness and establish and maintain the rule and supremacy of law.

A. W. LLOYD, Grand Chancellor.

ST. LOUIS, MO., July 23, 1919.

Hon. SELDEN P. SPENCER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The St. Louis Branch, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, is horrified at the shameful actions of the mobs of civilians and soldiers which are disgracing the Nation by the wanton slaughter of negro citizens. We urge you to use every effort to have the Government put an end to this mob murder and to establish law and order.

GEO. L. VAUGHN,
Chairman Executive Committee.

Mr. LENROOT presented a petition of sundry citizens of Wauwatosa, Wis., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the enforcement of war-time and national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I present the petitions of Mrs. Curtis Guild, Elinor Blanchard, Margaret F. Motley, Amy Gray, Harriet S. Motley, Maria P. Trumbull, and 68 other residents of Nahant; of Mary Brandegee, Eleanor M. Sears, and Pauline Danielson, of Boston; of Ruth A. Wendell and Bayard Tuckerman, of Ipswich; of Edith C. Ames, of North Easton; of Gertrude H. Whitwell, of Milton; of Beatrice Bill Talbot, of Wianno; of J. H. Hunnewell, of Wellesley; of Gertrude Adamowski, of West Manchester; and E. T. Coolidge, of Prides Crossing, all in the State of Massachusetts, praying that in the enactment of legislation restricting immigration into the United States domestic female servants be allowed entrance. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Immigration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts presented memorials of 919 employees of the Crompton & Knowles Loom Works, of Worcester; also of employees of the A. E. Little Co. and of the Reed & Prince Manufacturing Co., of Worcester; of the Bay State Saw & Tool Manufacturing Co., of Worcester; of E. W. Burt & Co. (Inc.), of Lynn; of the Chaffee Bros. Co., of Oxford; of the Hampden Toy Co., of Westfield; of the A. Burlingame Co., of Worcester; of John D. Young & Sons Co., of Boston; of Ashworth Bros. (Inc.), of Fall River; of the Palmer Carpet Mill, of the J. E. Torrey Razor Co., of Worcester; of the Parks-Cramer Co., of Fitchburg; of the Walker Vehicle Co., of R. Blackinton & Co., of North Attleboro; of the G. W. Bent Co., of Boston; of the Standard Thermometer Co., of Boston; of the Millers Falls Tool Co., of the F. H. Thomas Co., of Boston; of Myrton O. Hill & Co., of the Russia Cement Co., of Gloucester; of the Winthrop Cotton Yarn Co., of Taunton; of the Thompson-Crooker Shoe Co., of the New England Pressed Steel Co., of Natick; of the Jewett Piano Co., of Leominster; of the Van Tassel Tanning Co., of Stoneham; of the Northampton Silk Co., of Florence; of Fairclough & Gold (Inc.), of the Woodward & Powell Planer Co., of Worcester; of the Henry W. Breed Co., of Lynn; of the Lowe Bros. Co., of Boston; and of the Boston & Lockport Block Co., of East Boston, all in the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the repeal of the so-called daylight-saving law, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of Local Union No. 511, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, of Topeka, Kans., praying for Government ownership and control of railroads, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. KENYON presented a petition of the commissioner of education of Porto Rico, praying for the enactment of legislation to aid in the public education of the children of Porto Rico, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland presented a petition of sundry teacher students of the Maryland State Normal School, Towson, Md., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of Local Grange No. 380, Patrons of Husbandry, of Gazelle, Calif., and a petition of Local Union No. 155, Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union, of Pasadena, Calif., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HARRISON presented resolutions adopted at a meeting of sundry citizens of Philadelphia, Miss., relative to the death of James D. McDonald, a volunteer member of the Expeditionary Forces in France, who lost his life in the service of his country, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Natchez, Miss., praying for the enactment of legislation creating a civil-service engineer corps with a military status to be under the direction and orders of the Chief of Engineers, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. STERLING. I am directed by the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, to which was referred the bill (S. 1699) for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments, and I submit a report (No. 99) thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. McLEAN, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the bill (S. 170) to amend section 25 of the act of December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the act of September 7, 1916, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 100) thereon.

AMBASSADOR TO BELGIUM.

Mr. LODGE. From the Committee on Foreign Relations I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 75) authorizing the appointment of an ambassador to Belgium, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, as the representative of the United States, an ambassador to the Kingdom of Belgium, who shall receive as compensation the sum of $17,500 per annum.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. KNOX. From the Committee on Rules I submit a report to which I call the attention of the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I gave the necessary notice when I submitted the resolution for an amendment of the Standing Rules of the Senate. Therefore I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That Rule XVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate be, and is hereby, amended as follows:

After the words "to the Committee on Military Affairs" insert "to the Diplomatic and Consular Service bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations."

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. KIRBY:

A bill (S. 2594) to extend the time for the construction of the Broadway Street Bridge across the Arkansas River between the cities of Little Rock and Argenta, Ark.; and

A bill (S. 2595) to extend the time for the construction of the Main Street Bridge across the Arkansas River between the cities of Little Rock and Argenta, Ark.; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. GRONNA:

A bill (S. 2596) to promote the efficiency of the permanent Military Establishment, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 2597) to prevent the artificial stimulation of the export of immigrants' savings through propaganda, foreign subsidies, and the agencies of foreign Governments; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 2598) to carry into effect findings of the Court of Claims made in favor of Isabella G. Francis, administratrix of the estate of Roger A. Francis, deceased; and

A bill (S. 2599) for the relief of Charles D. Shay; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SUTHERLAND:

A bill (S. 2600) for the relief of John Lyons; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 2601) granting an increase of pension to Sarah A. Bryan; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 2602) to increase the salary of the United States district attorney for the southern district of Florida; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HALE:

A bill (S. 2603) granting a pension to Mary L. Bryant; to the Committee on Pensions.

REGULATION OF AERIAL NAVIGATION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I introduce a bill, which I send to the desk, to regulate the navigation of the air.

The bill (S. 2593) to regulate the navigation of the air was read twice by its title.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for a couple of minutes to present on this subject the reasons why I have introduced the bill. It is a subject which has heretofore not been covered by any legislation.

On July 21, 1919, 10 persons were killed and more than 25 seriously injured, some fatally, when a large dirigible balloon in a flight above the city of Chicago fell 500 feet, with its heavy motors and filled gasoline tanks crashing through the glass roof of the Illinois Trust & Savings Bank at the corner of La Salle Street and Jackson Boulevard. Most of the dead and injured were employees of the bank, who were trapped and burned to death in a resulting fire from the explosion of the balloon's gasoline tanks as they struck the floor of the bank rotunda, where more than 200 bookkeepers and clerks, nearly all girls, were working. A flame of gasoline enveloped the workers, some of whom were literally burned to death and charred beyond recognition when their bodies were recovered. Last week an airplane in another State fell in a field or orchard, killing members of a farmer's family. Accidents of the foregoing character are multiplying rapidly throughout the country. It is evident an emergency is rapidly approaching in the navigation of aircraft requiring proper regulations. To that end I have prepared the bill offered this morning as a basis for action. I do not submit it as a perfected measure. It is only the foundation for the Senate and House to concentrate their opinion upon and mature it into a workable measure as speedily as may be consistent with the due course of legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PROHIBITION OF INTOXICATING BEVERAGES.

Mr. PHELAN submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6810) to prohibit intoxicating beverages, and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—H. F. HARRINGTON.

On motion of Mr. WALSH of Montana, it was Ordered, That the papers accompanying the bill S. 815, Fifty-eighth Congress, first session, granting a pension to H. F. Harrington, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I have a short editorial taken from the American, of Grand Forks, N. Dak., a nonpartisan paper. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

"Those followers of the President who, irrespective of party affiliation, have looked upon him as the leading liberal force of the world can have been only supremely disappointed in his message yesterday to Congress, in which he was to render an accounting of his activities in making the peace.

"America asked for facts and obtained fine phrases.

"America asked for straightforwardness and obtained indirection and hypocrisy.

"They were the words of a man who has been up against the system and came out somewhat raveled.

"Now, it is furthest from the thought of all true Americans to be unfair or to take advantage of the President while he is defending, in a partisan political fight, the peace which he has brought back with him from Paris.

"It is unfortunate that this fight is forced upon Mr. Wilson in the way that it has been. We can have no sympathy with those battling old reactionaries who are leading the attack in the Senate upon the peace.

"America has entered into international politics. America has responsibilities in that way to-day which it can not dodge. The vague generalities of Mr. Wilson will do us no good. What we want to do is to look the facts directly in the eye and appraise them for what they are.

"We can not blame Mr. Wilson for failing in Paris. We do blame him for denying that failure. And we should know where to place that blame. We should be acquainted with the forces which brought about this condition by which America is robbed of the fruits of a war which it fought with all the valor of its gallant manhood and for ideals higher than any nation ever battled for.

"We can not subscribe to the half confession in Mr. Wilson's message that ideals are impossible of realization. For in that way lies destruction and despair.

"Mr. Wilson is a tired man. He has battled hard, no doubt. But we believe the people of the United States have balance enough to accept and pass judgment with the spirit of whole justice, and all that they want is an opportunity to be permitted access to the facts. Mr. Wilson in his message withheld all facts. And that was where his message was a failure and a confession that his mission was a failure.

"The country now is confronted with two courses. One is to reject the treaty, and the other is to accept it, in the hope that it may prove the basis, through public opinion, of attaining the ideals of the war at some future date.

"Mr. Wilson's wisest course would have been open confession that such was the one hope of the peace. His error is in contending that it is a success as it stands, for the people will not believe it.

"Mr. Wilson's assertion that the treaty squares with his principles is a challenge to the intelligence of the country. Of course he qualifies that statement by saying 'so far as possible' under the 'existing' international situations.

"The terms of the armistice specified the Allies were willing to make peace with Germany on the basis of President Wilson's address of January 8, 1918 (the 14 points), and 'subsequent addresses.'

"On September 27, 1918, the President said: 'The impartial justice meted out must involve no discrimination between those to whom we wish to be just and those to whom we do not wish to be just.'

"Mr. Wilson can hardly successfully maintain that this peace squares with that principle. And again he said:

"'There can be no special, selfish economic combinations within the league and no employment of any form of economic boycott or exclusion except as the power of economic penalty by exclusion from the markets of the world may be vested in the league of nations as a means of discipline and control.'

"Now, under this treaty, which Mr. Wilson so naively contends squares with his principles, the most rigid, iron-clad economic boycott of Germany is perpetuated, its execution is in the hands, practically speaking, of French and English bankers and manufacturers, through the one-sided prohibition against German tariff walls, the control of the German railway and sea transport system, and the device of no limit on reparations, which makes the reparations commission the real governing power of Germany for the next generation.

"Thus, in fact, the peace congress has played the rôle of conquest, behind its fine and disguised pretensions, with all the vigor and effectiveness of another kaiser.

"Arguments that the peace is justified because it is the kind of peace that Germany would have made are the refuge of the dishonest. We fought the war to end that kind of peace, and promised otherwise to a revolutionary Germany.

"Mr. Wilson points out in his address that Paris had to contend with the system of international politics, which aroused many difficulties.

"And there is the crux of the situation.

"The duty of Mr. Wilson and the conferees at Paris was to wipe out the old order.

"Good will and the courage to stand against imperialists at home as the soldiers stood against the imperialists in the field of battle were lacking, we read between the lines in the message. It is not the kind of peace that America would have made, Mr. Wilson declares. Isn't that a confession of failure?

"The armistice was based on the President's 14 points and his 'subsequent addresses.' Mr. Wilson was the voice and the executive of America. In other words, didn't the 'necessary' compromises of which Mr. Wilson speaks emasculate the ideals which Mr. Wilson so eloquently portrayed, and which were the force that drove the Allies to victory?

"Mr. Wilson, as usual, spoke in generalities. He confined his address to a résumé of the task that confronted the American delegates before they sailed for Paris. In giving an accounting of his stewardship it would have been better, had it been possible, to have been more specific regarding the fruits of those parleys which he contends were the best to be obtained.

"And we would like to know how Mr. Wilson squares the following with his principles:

"Is this a treaty of peace 'openly arrived at'?

"'Private international understandings,' were to be wiped out; yet the President comes back from Paris with a proposal that France and America enter into one.

"And how about the private understanding by which Japan assumes control over 40,000,000 inhabitants of Shantung in China, a country that was not an enemy power, but was in the war on the side of the Allies?

"And how about 'the removal of economic barriers and the establishment of an equality of trade conditions'?

"Is not Germany one of the nations 'consenting to the peace and associating themselves for its maintenance'? Then, why is Germany excluded from the league?

"Did not the fourteenth point define the proposed league of nations as 'a general association of nations,' not as the allied alliance which it is? The league could not be formed during the war, the President declared in his last address before the armistice, because it would be 'merely a new alliance confined to the nations associated against a common enemy.' Is the war still in progress?

"'Adequate guaranties' were demanded on the subject of armaments. Where have those guaranties been applied? Not even wisely to the enemy powers. Germany is permitted to maintain conscription because France fears the effect of such a precedent!

"And we have yet to hear of any guaranty on armaments to be applied to America or any other allied power that might be termed 'adequate.' Yet Mr. Wilson now says this clause was to apply only to 'mischievous nations.' Would we consider Japan a mischievous nation? How does it apply there? And is not the practice of conscription enough to make any nation 'mischievous'? Does not it still make Germany mischievous?

"There were to be no annexations. The effective annexation of the Saar by the French, despite the hypocritical denials that such is the effect, is a very evident violation of that principle if we look no further.

"'What we seek is the reign of law, based on the consent of the governed and sustained by the organized opinion of mankind,' said the President on July 4, 1918.

"Do the settlements regarding the Saar, the splicing of millions of Germans in Bohemia and Austria on Czechoslovakia, and others in Silesia, West Prussia, and Posen on Poland, and those others who go to Italy, contribute to 'a reign of law based on the consent of the governed'?

"Does Mr. Wilson contend that we have not 'discriminated between those to whom we wish to be just and those to whom we do not wish to be just'?

"America can not see in these arrangements the 'minor compromises' which Mr. Wilson mentions. It is these 'minor' compromises which have bred war throughout history.

"This was to be a peace that was to end war. America will not swallow Mr. Wilson's pretense that it is a success."

REPEAL OF DAYLIGHT-SAVING LAW.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, various phases of the daylight-saving law have been considered by this and the other legislative body. I have received the following communication presenting another angle to the discussion. I should like to have it inserted in the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read as follows:

1327 NINTH STREET EAST,
Salt Lake City, Utah, July 14, 1919.

Senator WILLIAM H. KING,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In the matter of the repeal of the daylight-saving bill, I wonder if anyone has presented the view of the mother with small children to get off to school. I have four, and at an early time in the season I must begin getting them up almost before daylight to get them off to school on time. They are so rushed and hurried they will seldom eat their breakfast properly, and almost every day report a large number of tardy pupils in their rooms.

I have talked with a great many mothers and teachers on the subject, and almost without exception they have felt that the daylight-saving plan was a burden, intolerable, except for the fact that it was a war measure.

If you could get them (the children) to bed an hour earlier, it might be different, but you can not arbitrarily change a child's bedtime, and a little later it is too light and warm for them to go to bed at the proper time by the clock. After the children are rushed off helter-skelter by 8 o'clock, "Heaven's time," the mother has all the little chores to do herself which might have been done by them in another hour.

If it would really help some "poor, down-trodden, laboring man," it would be different, but none of them work more than eight or nine hours a day, and shops are not kept open late at night as they were in Benjamin Franklin's time. There isn't a laboring man in the country who puts in as many hours a day as a mother with small children.

I sincerely hope the repeal will be passed over President Wilson's veto—and I voted for him, too.

Respectfully,
ETHEL R. CARLQUIST.

Mr. SHERMAN. May I make an inquiry of the Senator from Utah? I fear that the writer of this letter does not see how the repeal of the daylight-saving law will interfere with afternoon golf playing. It takes an act of Congress to get a golf player out of bed an hour earlier in the morning. I beg the Senate will consider that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The communication will be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

PROPAGANDA ON PACKING INDUSTRY.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have here a number of letters protesting against the passage of the Kenyon-Kendrick bill in the Senate and the Anderson bill, so called, in the House; one by the Hon. Joseph S. Peery, one of the leading citizens of my State; one by Mr. George Prentice; one by Mr. Parsons; and one by Mr. Kerr. I ask that the letter from Mr. Peery and the one from Mr. Parsons be printed in the RECORD, and that all be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the letters were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and the two indicated were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, July 16, 1919.

Hon. WILLIAM H. KING,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have been in the sheep business in Utah for the last 20 years and am not connected, directly or indirectly, with any packing house, stockyards, or live-stock commission business.

Believing that the Kenyon and Kendrick bills of the Senate and the Anderson bill of the House will be body blows against the live-stock business, I hereby protest against those bills and petition you to use your influence against their passage.

I believe this is the opinion of the sheepmen generally of the intermountain States.

Yours, respectfully, JOSEPH S. PEERY.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, July 16, 1919.

Hon. WILLIAM H. KING,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I feel that I would be neglecting my duty to the stock growers of the West if I failed to do what little I could to call the attention of Congress through you and others to the danger which is to be found in two bills which have been introduced in the Senate and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, one known as the Kenyon bill, introduced June 23, 1919 (S. 2202, 66th Cong., 1st sess.), and the other as the Kendrick bill, introduced the same day (S. 2199), both entitled "A bill to stimulate the production, sale, and distribution of live stock and live-stock products, and for other purposes." A similar bill to the Kenyon bill, and known as the Anderson bill, was introduced in the House of Representatives and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

After reading the bills carefully I consider the titles misleading, or it may be that the two words "other purposes" may be the better title, which means the tearing down of a great industry which it has taken 50 years or more to build, without any possible chance of bettering the condition of the business, and if carried out to finality it would mean higher costs to the consumer, inferior production and service, besides tremendous waste of finished product.

The Kenyon bill is by far the most radical, and it seems to me that it is simply vicious in its terms. Both bills are vicious, radical, and absolutely socialistic in their effect.

I feel that the Kenyon bill is the result of the crusade of Francis J. Heney against the packing-house industry, in which he, as usual, conducted an unfair, sensational examination unsupported by the facts, but supported by newspaper propaganda.

I do not want to tire you with going over ground with which you are undoubtedly familiar, but why should the Government seek to tear down and control one of the greatest industries of this country which it has taken more than half a century to build up to its present efficient standard? If it is right and lawful in this case, why not in every other branch of private business? If it can be defended in one, it can in every other trade, business, or profession.

It seems to me that instead of being progressive measures they are decidedly the reverse, and, as before stated, socialistic in the extreme. They seem to want to divorce the packing houses from all other interests of any nature, such as cold-storage plants, ownership of refrigerator cars and ownership of stockyards' stock, and many other lines which are the direct outgrowth of the packing industry.

I want you to understand that I am not defending the packers. There may be instances where they have injured the public through the power in their hands, but it is my candid opinion that they are better serving the public to-day than it would be possible for that same public to be served through the channels indicated in these measures. Take the matter of refrigerator cars: Why should they be deprived of ownership of this equipment, which is more a part of the economical handling and distribution than any other part of the machinery of their organization? What would these gentlemen say if it were proposed to take the ownership of the Pullman cars from that company and say that the railroad companies must own and operate their own cars in that branch of their service? I doubt very much whether it would be possible for this great industry to carry on their business if the ownership of these cars were taken away from them. They certainly could never give the same service.

If either of these bills passed and the control of the packing houses and stockyards should be turned over to the incompetent handling that would follow through the inexperienced hands of Government clerks and red tape of bureau administration, would it stimulate production, sale, or distribution of live-stock products? The principle is wrong in its inception, and all the regulating that can be brought to bear would not make it right.

I hope and believe that you will look into this matter very carefully and do whatever you can to prevent the passage of either of the bills, and especially the Kenyon bill.

Yours, very truly,

M. K. PARSONS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I did not object to the request of the Senator from Utah, but I hope it will not be used as a precedent. If all the protests by telegram, by letter, and by petition, which are now being sent to Washington by the packers and through their propaganda are to be placed in the RECORD our need for paper will come very nearly exhausting the contingent expense appropriation of the Senate.

Mr. KING. I hope the Senator from Colorado does not mean to intimate by anything he just said that the gentlemen whose names I have mentioned are representatives of the packers, because they are not.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not mean to intimate anything of the sort, but I do mean to say that thousands of the best-meaning men and women in the country are being persuaded to write telegrams and letters to Senators and Representatives protesting against the Kenyon bill. I have letters and telegrams by the score every day from men and women of the best intentions, good citizens, most of whom, I am satisfied, know no more about what is in the Kenyon bill than I do about the signs of the Mexican zodiac.

Mr. KING. The gentlemen to whom I have referred are men who are engaged in the live-stock industry and have been, some of them, for 35 years. They know what the live-stock industry is and they know what the packers' industry is. They know what the so-called Kenyon, Kendrick, and Anderson bills are. They are opposed to them, and they are not influenced by any packers or by any representations made by the packers.

Mr. THOMAS. Then they are an honorable exception to the rule.

Mr. KING. I do not agree with the Senator at all.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I hope this practice will not continue, but I wish to say that the names mentioned by my colleague [Mr. KING] are among the very best citizens of my State. I do know that they are interested in the cattle and sheep business. This seems to be a propaganda between the packers and the National Wholesale Grocers' Association, one upon one side and the other upon the other. I think myself we have published in the RECORD about as many of such letters as ought to be published.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if he claims that the National Wholesale Grocers' Association, as he calls it, is carrying on this kind of a propaganda. All I have seen that they have been doing is to try to thwart what the packers are doing.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator has not seen all that this organization has been doing.

Mr. KENYON. No; I have not.

Mr. SMOOT. This organization is generally very active in propaganda for any legislation that they desire, or are opposed to, the same as the packers are. They have injected themselves into legislation on other occasions by the most widespread propaganda. I think the Senator introduced in the RECORD yesterday a number of telegrams received by him from that organization in relation to the propaganda of the packers.

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. It is a fight of the National Wholesale Grocers' Association, and they are at present endeavoring to bring in the retail grocers' association against the packers of the United States. That is what the fight means.

Mr. KENYON. I suppose the Senator from Utah stating that ends the controversy; but there is no such fight at all. The Wholesale Grocers' Association may be fighting for their lives against the packers. I expect they are; but that is not the fight. The fight is between the people who have to have things to eat and those who are controlling their food prices, whether it be the packers or the wholesale grocers' organization, or whatever it may be.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say if the wholesale grocery companies made no more profit upon the overturn than the packers of the country do, and the retail grocery concerns of the country made ten times the profits the packers do in their overturn, the high cost of living would be greatly reduced in every part of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator from Iowa that the wholesale grocer is engaged in a holy crusade. He can commit no wrong. I know what the wholesale grocer has done in politics in the Mississippi Valley. When they start on a crusade or begin a propaganda they are just as persistent, just as solicitous of their own selfish interests, as any occupation I know of in this country.

I have some acquaintance with the wholesale grocers' associations and some of the retail grocers' associations in the various States. As the Senator from Utah has said, if they would confine themselves to the very small proportion of the profits realized by the packers, both large and small, the high cost of living in the country would be greatly reduced. But it is entirely sanctified when the wholesale grocers start a crusade. Anything they present is in deference to the holy right of petition secured by the Constitution and the blood of the fathers; but when it is presented by anybody else it is a vile propaganda, to be frowned upon and editorialized in the newspapers.

I should like to have the Senator from Iowa take some of his own medicine.

Mr. KENYON. I realize that whenever any reference is made to the packers there are gentlemen who come immediately to their defense, and this talk as to a campaign by the wholesale grocers is, of course, a favorite weapon for them to use.

I have no defense of the wholesale grocers, or their overcharges, that the Senator has referred to. I realize, and everybody might as well realize, that those who always place a halo in this Chamber and other places around the packers are going to make the reason why the bill now sought to regulate the packers should be defeated is that it is a fight between the wholesale grocers and the packers. If the wholesale grocers are doing this, let us get some way to remedy it. So far as the bills are concerned, introduced by the Senator from Wyoming and myself, the wholesale grocers of the country have had absolutely nothing to do with them, and you can not camouflage this issue to the country by putting up that kind of a smoke screen.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Regular order!

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for a few minutes, to make a statement with reference to this matter. I simply want to state that I have received, I think, several thousand telegrams and many hundreds of letters upon this question. I have not presented any of them to the Senate because they are coming to my office every day as chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

I also want to make it clear that, so far as I am concerned, I consider the bills introduced by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] and the bills introduced by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] upon this question are of the highest importance. I believe that the committee will sustain me in my position that hearings ought to be held on these bills, and that no drastic legislation should be enacted until the parties in interest have been heard.

These petitions come from business men and from farmers and, of course, from all parts of the United States. I believe they have a right to send these petitions to us. I do not wish to deny the right to anyone in our country to petition Congress.

It is possibly true that a propaganda is carried on and that some one is responsible for it, but I want to make it perfectly plain that neither the Government—and when I say the "Government" I mean the Federal Trade Commission—nor the packers will control the action of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry how to proceed. My course will be pursued in accordance with my own belief and understanding, and I shall direct my efforts to do what is for the best interest of the public.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I was a member of the Federal Trade Commission when the Borland resolution was introduced to investigate the meat packers of the country. I personally know that one of the greatest lobbies that has ever been before Congress tried to defeat the Borland resolution. After the Borland resolution was passed and the Federal Trade Commission began investigating the packers, the packers had a great lobby here trying to prevent the investigation from being thorough in going into the high cost of living.

While a member of the Trade Commission we investigated the Standard Oil Co., and other great trusts, and I think if you will read the report of the Federal Trade Commission you will find that the packing interests of the country are equally as dangerous to the consuming public. They affect the cost of living of every man, woman, and child in the country.

I know that these people have influenced some of the very best men in my State and had them telegraph me here to oppose these measures which they would not have done had they understood the provisions of this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. As the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] assumes to speak as a former member of the Federal Trade Commission, now a Senator of the United States, I think it no more than just to have placed in the RECORD a statement by Mr. Swift concerning the report of the Federal Trade Commission of July 11, 1919, so that both sides of the question may be brought to the attention of those who may read the RECORD.

Mr. KENYON. What is the date?

Mr. SMOOT. July 11, 1919.

Mr. KENYON. If the report of the commission to the President has not been placed in the RECORD I am going to ask during the day that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know whether it has been printed in the RECORD or not. I will place the statement of Mr. Swift in the RECORD now, if there is no objection, and the Senator can place the report in the RECORD if he so desires.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

STATEMENT BY MR. LOUIS F. SWIFT CONCERNING REPORT OF FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION ISSUED JULY 11, 1919.

"CHICAGO, July 11.

"Louis F. Swift, president of Swift & Co., to-day declared that the latest report of the Federal Trade Commission contained no new facts and was an evident effort to influence at this time proposed radical legislation.

"Mr. Swift said:

"'This latest report of the Federal Trade Commission is merely an attack upon large and successful business organizations, and should be resented by all Americans who are proud of the industrial progress of the Nation. It contains nothing new, and it is an outgrowth of the former discredited Heney ex parte investigation.

"'This report, so far as I am informed, contains absolutely no evidence of collusion among the five largest packers; and I say for Swift & Co., as I have said many times, that we have no agreement of any kind with any other packer to affect the prices of live stock or meats.

"'The manner in which the Trade Commission juggles figures and resorts to sensationalism betrays the insincerity of the commission. We are living up to both the spirit and the letter of the law and want to cooperate with the Government in every helpful and constructive way, but we must protest against the methods used by this important branch of the Government.

"'I say that the large packers and their individual businesses are a public benefit and a decided factor in keeping down the spread between live stock and meat prices.

"'This report is put out now as a part of the propaganda in which the Trade Commission, with others, is engaged, seeking to subject the packing industry and other lines of business to the arbitrary control of subordinate Government officials, through a license system.

"'It is to be regretted that in these days, when the public feels keenly the pressure of high prices, a Government body does not give out facts respecting prices and profits. This has never been done fairly by the Federal Trade Commission as regards the packing industry, although the commission has constantly had the most complete information in its possession.

"'No one disputes that out of the total receipts of the packers derived from the products of animals about 85 per cent is paid out for the live animals themselves. About 13 per cent is paid out for wages, transportation, and other such expenses. About 2 per cent on this turnover is earned by the packer as net profit. And no one disputes that this amount is but a small fraction of a cent per pound, and that it is so negligible as not in any event to affect the price which the consumer pays for meats.

"'The report just issued by the Trade Commission and its discussion of the number of subsidiary companies and its calculation of percentages of the classes of business handled by the packers are not only erroneous, but are entirely immaterial to the real question in which the public is interested, namely, why are prices high?

"'I do not believe that the findings of such a prejudiced and unfair report should be used to influence public opinion or as a basis for the radical legislation that has been introduced at Washington.'"

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. GRONNA. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7413) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with an amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota yield to me?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield.

Mr. DIAL. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	McKellar	Shields
Ball	Harding	McLean	Simmons
Bankhead	Harris	McNary	Smith, Ga.
Beckham	Harrison	Moses	Smith, S. C.
Calder	Henderson	Myers	Smoot
Capper	Hitchcock	Nelson	Spencer
Culberson	Johnson, Calif.	New	Sterling
Cummins	Johnson, S. Dak.	Newberry	Sutherland
Curtis	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Swanson

Fletcher	Knox	Pomerene	Williams
France	La Follette	Ransdell	Wolcott
Gay	Lenroot	Robinson
Gerry	Lodge	Sheppard
Gronna	McCumber	Sherman

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] are detained on official business.

Mr. KIRBY. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] are necessarily absent.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] is absent on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

PEACE TREATY AND LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in the course of some remarks by the distinguished and very learned Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] some time ago he made the statement that of course everybody agreed that peace was desirable and that war was undesirable, and certainly we all do agree to that; but it seems to me that there are other fundamental facts in connection with this most important matter that we can all agree upon. It seems to me that if no firm and binding agreement is made in this treaty to secure an enduring peace for the world in the future, then, of course, the world will lapse into that position where it was previously—namely, that the strong nations will continue to prey upon the weak; that the powerful nation will continue to take territory from its less powerful neighbor; that the great nations of the earth will continue to build up greater armies and greater navies at tremendous cost and expense, jeopardizing constantly the peace of the world; and that secret treaties will continue to be entered into, constantly menacing the peace of the world. It seems to me that any fair-minded honest man will agree that this will be true if no general agreement is had at this time to preserve the peace of the world. I believe even the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the able Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] will agree to these propositions. I believe they will also agree that if an agreement can be made making war impossible, or even greatly lessening the possibility of war, it would be the greatest one event that has happened in the history of the world for ages.

It is this step that the American Government under the leadership of Mr. Wilson has undertaken to take in this treaty before us to-day. If the effort is successful, it will mean more for the advancement, progress, peace, and prosperity of this country and all other countries than any one step that has ever been taken in our history, or, for that matter, that has ever been taken in the history of the world in 2,000 years.

Mr. President, there have been running through our entire history two lines of political thought. Most frequently those lines of thought have followed political lines, but not always. As we all know, they followed for the most part, first, Whig and Tory; later on, Federalist and Republican; later, Republican and Whig; and, later still, Democratic and Republican. I do not believe that any of these terms exactly express the idea that I wish to impress to-day. The true line of demarcation, as it seems to me, is better expressed in the more modern terms, "reactionaries" and "progressives."

There have ever been in this country from the beginning of our Government reactionaries who said that certain things could not be done; there have ever been progressives in our history who have said that things governmentally progressive could be done, and they have been done. It will be remembered that when our forefathers undertook to declare their independence from Great Britain there were Tories who said that it could not be done; and when it was undertaken later to establish a government, a republic, the reactionaries of that date said, just as they are saying now, "Oh, it can not be done; republics have always been failures. We ourselves have failed. The Continental Congress has been a failure; the Confederation has been a failure; and if you establish this Republic under the Constitution, it will be a failure."

That has been the cry of reactionaries throughout the entire history of this Republic. The line of thought has been defined perfectly in every age. It is defined to-day, Mr. President. When we come to consider this great contemplated step in our country's history, there are reactionaries who say that it can not be done, and there are other great progressive spirits who say that it can be done, and it is going to be done. There is not the slightest doubt that this league will be ratified, and this great forward-looking step taken by our Government and all the rest.

I wish to recall for a few moments to the minds of Senators here certain well-known facts in our history. You will recall that when our Government was first established we had only a little tier of territory along the Atlantic seaboard, running from Georgia on the south to Maine on the north, altogether not much larger than the State of Texas, if any larger. In every step of our growth since the reactionaries have interposed objections and endeavored to prevent the physical as well as the governmental and moral growth and power of our country. Why, when Mr. Washington announced the doctrine of "no entangling alliances," he was denounced as a reactionary. No man who ever held the presidential chair was abused by so large a proportion of the people of this country as Mr. Washington was abused for the part that he took in the great progressive steps that attended the beginning of our Government. He became so unpopular that he was even called in derision the "stepfather of his country." Yet he took them, and we all realize now that under the conditions that then existed they were the very steps that should have been taken, and they made our country greater and stronger and better than ever before.

In 1803 Mr. Jefferson, the strictest constructionist of them all, the father of the Democratic Party, undertook to buy from Napoleon Bonaparte ,who was then first consul of France and who was hard up for money, what is known as the Louisiana Purchase, a great empire in itself, stretching from the Mississippi River to the Rocky Mountains and from Canada to the Gulf of Mexico. Immediately the reactionaries in this country, in the Senate and out of the Senate, took up the hue and cry against Mr. Jefferson. They said that he was doing an unconstitutional act in attempting to buy that great territory. They said that he was false to his own oath of office; they said he was untrue to his country; they said that as a matter of policy it was wrong, and no good could ever come of it. Yet we know that Mr. Jefferson pursued the even tenor of his way, notwithstanding his reactionary enemies, and made the purchase, which was duly ratified by the Senate; and who is there to-day who for a moment would think that Mr. Jefferson was wrong in the great progressive step that he took on that occasion? Yet he was abused just as much as the President of the United States to-day is being abused on account of the league of nations for taking that great progressive step.

A few years later, in 1817 and 1818, when Andrew Jackson had pressed the Indians and the Spaniards into the wilds of Florida and Alabama and Mississippi, and a treaty was proposed with Spain by which we obtained Florida and Alabama and Mississippi, and annexed that great territory to our country, the reactionaries in and out of the Senate condemned it as being unconstitutional and wrong, and yet it was done; and who is there to-day who will say it ought not to have been done?

Later on, in 1845, when a distinguished Tennesseean was President of this Republic, when it was proposed to enter into a war with Mexico, when it was proposed to annex Texas, and when all that great territory of the West was taken in, Mr. Polk was abused and vilified just exactly in the same way that reactionaries have vilified and abused the President whenever a great step of this kind was taken.

In 1863—and I want to be fair about the matter—when Abraham Lincoln issued his proclamation freeing the slaves in this country, his act at that time was denounced as unconstitutional by men all over the land; and yet it was done, and who is there to-day that would say that it was wrong to have taken it?

When we bought Alaska in 1867, that was denounced as an unconstitutional and an injudicious act.

In 1898, and before that, when, under Mr. Cleveland and Mr. McKinley, Hawaii came in, that step was denounced in the same way.

In 1898, when Mr. McKinley was at the head of the Government, and the Philippines and Porto Rico were taken in, the distinguished colleague of the present senior Senator from Massachusetts on the floor of the Senate led the fight of the reactionaries, and abused the Government and the President of the Republic for leading this Government into taking the Philippines and Porto Rico.

So a few years later, when Mr. Roosevelt was President, in 1903, and Mr. Roosevelt overnight, as it were, entered into an agreement with the seceding State of Panama, and agreed to uphold the sovereignty of Panama as an independent nation in return for the right to dig the Panama Canal, we all know that the reactionaries in the Senate and out of it abused and maligned President Roosevelt, just as they are abusing and maligning President Wilson to-day for the great step that he wishes this country to take.

Think of those facts of history—great outstanding facts, each one of them, that we all now admit add to the greatness and the glory and the strength of this Nation, and yet every one of them was fought, fought to the bitter end in every instance, perhaps with the exception of Alaska—fought by the reactionaries!

What are the lessons to be learned from these well-known facts in our history—and I could refer to others—these facts that show that our country has grown from a little territory along the Atlantic seaboard into the greatest Nation in the world. Why, these facts show that this is no new proposition that our reactionary friends are presenting to the Nation to-day. This is no new question. It is just the same old fight, renewed every time that a proposal is made to make our country richer and happier and more peaceful and more blessed than it was before. These are the lessons.

Senators, look to the pages of your country's history. What names do you find there? Do you find the names of the men who said that these great steps should be taken, or do you find the names of the reactionaries who said: "Oh, no; do not let us take them"? You find the names of Washington and of Jefferson and of Madison and of Hamilton, who fought to make this Government in its beginning. You find the names of Monroe, of Jackson, and of Polk, and of Lincoln, and of McKinley, and of Roosevelt, who have helped to build it up. But I should like to know if, with the exception of Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, any gentleman in this Senate, by drawing on all his learning and ability, can remember the names of those reactionary Senators who abused our former Presidents for taking these steps?

Oh, no, Senators. If you look to your country's history, you will find there emblazoned, in letters that will never be erased, the names of the men, the progressive men, who were willing to take these forward-looking and nation-building steps.

Mr. President, they were not backward-looking men. They were forward-looking men. They were not men who looked only to the past for precedents. They looked to the past for example, but forward to the future for action.

Mr. President, I next come to a statement that was made some time ago by one of my best friends in the Senate, a man whom I love very much personally, a great debater, one of the greatest in this or any other country, perhaps the greatest in the Senate or out of it. I refer to the advice given to us southern Senators in regard to voting for or being in favor of this peace treaty by the distinguished senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Well, I do not know; whenever a race question comes up I believe I will trust the southern Senators with being able to find out whether there is such a question arising. They usually know one when they see it. I doubt if we have to go elsewhere for advice on that subject. But the distinguished senior Senator from Missouri said to us that we were voting to put this Republic in the hands of the black and yellow and red races of the world, and principally in the hands of the black races, when we voted for this league. This is no new idea on the part of the distinguished senior Senator from Missouri. I happened to look over some of the pages of our country's history in this connection, and I found a very strange statement that I wish to acquaint the Senate with for just a moment. I found, in going over the congressional debates of 1803, when it was a question of upholding President Jefferson in taking over the Louisiana Purchase, the same arguments made at that time by the reactionary Senators in this body that are being made now. I want to read from a current writing that was inserted in the RECORD at that time. Listen to this:

When we read the treaty—

That is, the treaty with Napoleon—

When we read the treaty we find that it involves our honor; it involves also our most essential interests. It takes out of the country almost a score of millions, enough to fit and equip such a fleet as would have rendered this treaty unnecessary. It changes the identity of our Nation. The United States are no longer the same.

Listen to this, now:

We are soon to look for our rulers to the red, yellow, and black brethren beyond the Mississippi.

The State of Missouri is a part of the Louisiana Purchase; and here, a little over 100 years ago, the argument was being made that if they took Missouri into the Union, or if it became American territory, we were going to turn our Republic over to the yellow, black, and red races across the Mississippi River, because at that time it was largely inhabited by those races.

Why, if you strike out "across the Mississippi River," that language is as much like the language of the senior Senator from Missouri on the league of nations as it is possible to make it; and I am curious to know if some ancestor of the senior Senator from Missouri did not write that speech.

But that is not all. The senior Senator from Missouri points to our turning our country over to the yellow and black and red races; and listen to what was said in the same debate:

The puny heads of our theorists—

He was talking about Jefferson then—

The puny heads of our theorists could not sustain so vast a machine as the government of the whole empire, supposing it should all be open to colonization and settlement.

He is talking about Mr. REED's State now:

And if they should adopt the more rational policy of keeping it an untrodden waste for owls to hoot and wolves to howl in, the realm of alligators and catamounts, they have not the vigor, and they dare not use the means, to prevent the "squatting" of hosts of renegades and outlaws and fugitives who would laugh at our laws, and when they become numerous would defy our force and proclaim independence.

Why, it is almost parallel language to the speech of the senior Senator from Missouri on what is going to happen to us if we southern Senators permit this treaty to be ratified.

Ah, Mr. President, my gifted friend, my eloquent friend, my splendid friend, is wrong. He is wrong in his idea that because some of the black republics are made a part of this league it is going to hurt it. It is wrong in principle and can be proven to be wrong right here and now.

If the Senator from Missouri is right, the first thing that he ought to do is to prepare a law that will expel the States of South Carolina and Mississippi from this Union, because the States of South Carolina and Mississippi are black by an overwhelming majority. I think the States of South Carolina and Mississippi are very well represented in this body. I do not think the two Senators from each of those States should be expelled because a majority of their constituents are black.

It seems to me the Senators from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. HARRISON] and the Senators from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH and Mr. DIAL] have amply looked after the interests of those States with black majorities, and the country is none the worse off by the presence of those States or by the presence of such splendid representatives in this body. And yet if we follow the reasoning of the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]—God save the mark—we can not keep these States in the Union. I think this argument is wholly unworthy of the great ability of the senior Senator from Missouri. It can not be accounted for except upon one ground, that he unwittingly permitted his prejudice against one man to interfere with his usual good judgment.

Mr. President, I next come to the proposition as stated by the distinguished and very learned senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. Last December he made a speech on this peace treaty, but I am not going to read it; I am going to ask permission to put it in the RECORD. I am merely going to say this about it: In a part of that speech he made a statement as to what the United States should insist should go into the treaty. He virtually stated the terms that he thought should go into the peace treaty. A better statement could not be made by any man in America or outside. He stated as clearly and as accurately as any man could possibly state what should be included in the peace treaty.

Physical guaranties which when taken would make signatures to treaties negligible can alone assure a durable peace with Germany. I do not need to rehearse what those physical guaranties should be, for I have stated my views upon them more than once to the Senate, and I think there is a general agreement among them not only in the Senate, but among the American people. They include the restoration of Belgium, the return of Alsace-Lorraine to France, of the Italian Irredenta to Italy, the establishment of the Jugo-Slav State, and of an independent State formed by the Czecho-Slovaks. They include also the security of Greece, the settlement of Albania and Montenegro, the restoration of Roumania, the consolidation of all the Roumanian people under one government, as well as the neutralization of the straits, the putting of Constantinople under international protection, with Greece perhaps the mandatory of the powers to administer the affairs of the city, the independence of Armenia, the return of those portions of Asia Minor where Greeks are predominant to Greece, the protection of Syria and Palestine from the Turks, a large, powerful, and independent Polish State, the independence of Russia's Baltic Provinces, the return of Danish Slesvig to the Danes, and the neutralization of the Kiel Canal. These physical guaranties which I have thus far suggested all have one object, and that is so to hem Germany in that she can not attempt conquest in Russia or in the East, and that the Slavic populations, which she has mercilessly used in her wars, can never be used by her again. In addition to these guaranties there must be heavy indemnities paid by Germany for the ruin she has wrought in Belgium and northern France and in Italy, and for her destruction of vessels, both neutral and belligerent, through the use of submarines. In those indemnities the United States must have its proper and proportional share, not only direct indemnity for its ships destroyed by submarines and its people murdered on the Lusitania and other vessels, but a suitable restitution, in part, at least, of the vast expenses forced upon us by Germany.

It will be for the peace conference to determine what disposition should be made of the German colonies, but one thing is essential, and that is that they should not be returned to the tyrannical misgovernment of Germany, and that she should be deprived of those means for extending her commerce and building up military outposts in all parts of the world. The payment of the indemnities will be a work of time, and it will be necessary to take and hold ample security for the extinction of these debts. It is the duty of the Allies and the United States to meet and determine what terms they will impose upon Germany, and then, and not until then, call in the representatives of Germany and impose the terms upon them. When this is done the first great step will be taken toward the establishment of the world's peace. If we eliminate Germany from the opportunity to make war, the only source from which war is likely to come would be closed for generations. Such, in outline, are the necessary steps demanded by exact justice, upon which, I think, the United States and the Allies are substantially agreed, in order to make a lasting peace with Germany. By making peace by imposing the terms which we think proper upon Germany is only half the work which at this moment must be done. The peace must not only be made and agreed to, but it must be effective, and to render the peace effective there is much more to do than can be done by ink and paper. The first thing needful is to face the situation and look facts in the face. Nothing can be accomplished unless we work in complete harmony with those who are associated with us in the war against the Central Powers. I know very well that technically we had no treaty of alliance with the Allies by whose side we fought, but technicalities are of no consequence in the presence of facts. No treaty of alliance could have caused a greater unity of action than was established between us and the nations with whom we joined in the war against Germany. Binding arrangements were made for common action in regard to food supplies, in regard to fuel, in regard to munitions of war, for the building of railroads and docks and everything concerning supplies of the armies in France. Our Navy worked in close alliance with the navies of Great Britain, France, and Italy. Our troops served under the command of a French marshal. All these things were vitally necessary, and these relations must be continued if we are not to lose at the peace table what we won in the field. To attempt in any way to separate us from our Allies now or to prevent perfect unity of action is as harmful as such efforts were when we were fighting in Northern France and on the plains of Flanders. To encourage or even to permit any serious differences to arise between the United States and Great Britain, or with France, or Italy, or Belgium, would be a world calamity of the worst kind. Any serious difference among English-speaking people would be deplorable in the highest degree. Any thought of war among them would be as abominable as it is inconceivable. To differ greatly with France, bound to us by so many ties of faith and affection, or with Italy, or with Belgium, is unthinkable.

Do not forget, however, that German propaganda with this object in view is as active and poisonous to-day as it has ever been.

* * * * * * * *

We took up arms against Germany because we were determined not only to protect our own safety and independence against her attacks but because the people of the United States believed that if the world was to be a possible place for free, law-abiding people to live in, the autocratic system and the organized barbarism of Germany must once for all be eliminated from among the nations. We went to war to save civilization. For this mighty purpose we have sacrificed thousands of American lives and spent billions of American treasure. We can not, therefore, leave the work half done. We are as much bound, not merely by interest and every consideration for a safe future but by honor and self-respect, to see that the terms of peace are carried out, as we were to fulfill our great determination that the armies of Germany should be defeated in the field. We can not halt or turn back now. We must do our share to carry out the peace as we have done our share to win the war, of which the peace is an integral part. We must do our share in the occupation of German territory which will be held as security for the indemnities to be paid by Germany. We can not escape doing our part in aiding the peoples to whom we have helped to give freedom and independence in establishing themselves with ordered governments, for in no other way can we erect the barriers which are essential to prevent another outbreak by Germany upon the world. We can not leave the Jugo-Slavs, the Czecho-Slovaks, and the Poles, the Lithuanians, and the other states which we hope to see formed and marching upon the path of progress and development unaided and alone.

A little later the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] made another statement on another occasion in which he deprecated that differences had arisen between President Wilson and his colleagues on the peace commission and our Allies over there. Senators will remember that it was stated in the public prints that Mr. Wilson wanted to insert in the peace treaty the league of nations and that our Allies wanted to postpone it. Senators will remember that the reactionary Senators at once brought in resolutions to postpone the league of nations, and said that the President was not getting along very well with the other peace commissioners.

In that situation here is what the senior Senator from Massachusetts said. He wanted them to get along. I do not think he cared so much about the President of the United States, but he wanted to let it be known that the reactionary element of the Senate stood with these other gentlemen representing our Allies in opposing the President on the league of nations, and this is what the Senator gave out to the public at that time. It is impossible to improve upon the language. Here is what he said:

To attempt in any way to separate us from our Allies now or to prevent perfect unity of action is as harmful as such efforts were when we were fighting in northern France and on the plains of Flanders. To encourage or even to permit any serious differences to arise between the United States and Great Britain, or with France, or Italy, or Belgium, would be a world calamity of the worst kind. Any serious difference among English-speaking people would be deplorable in the highest degree. Any thought of war among them would be as abominable as it is inconceivable. To differ greatly with France, bound to us by so many ties of faith and affection, or with Italy or Belgium, is unthinkable.

Do not forget, however, that German propaganda with this object in view is as active and poisonous to-day as it has ever been. The people here and in the allied countries who would favor Germany are again busy in the effort to part the Allies and the United States from each other.

Mr. President, what has come over the Senator from Massachusetts and his associates? What has brought about the marvelous change in him? Mr. President, President Wilson and his associates at the peace council are absolutely at one with all of the representatives of the other great nations associated with us in this war. They have gotten along with the utmost friendliness in performing the great tasks that have been assigned to them. There is no substantial difference of opinion between all of the great allied nations. There is no substantial difference of opinion between the English-speaking peoples in that conference. The utmost harmony prevails. Apparently they are united in doing just what Senator LODGE said they ought to do.

The only discordant note, the only criticism, the only objection, the only fight, comes from Senator LODGE and his associates. The only attempt to break up the cordial relations existing between the representatives of this Government and the representatives of the allied Governments comes from Senator LODGE and his associates in the Senate. No other nation, or faction, except possibly a faction in China, is making any trouble. No other nation is protesting. Our own people are not protesting. The only protest that comes comes from Senator LODGE and his associates.

Why this change? If it was a good thing, in the words of Senator LODGE, that the Allies and ourselves should work in perfect harmony, and that every action should be unified action last December, why is not it a good thing now? If it was a bad thing to encourage and permit serious differences last December, why is it a good thing for Senator LODGE and his associates to encourage differences now? If it was a bad thing last December for anyone to encourage serious differences among English-speaking peoples, why is it a good thing for Senator LODGE and his associates to encourage differences between English-speaking peoples now?

Senator LODGE even said that if any such differences were encouraged, it was due to the German propaganda. It can't be possible that this great change that has come over Senator LODGE and his associates is due to German propaganda. I know the Senator too well to believe that. We all know and believe in his patriotism and admire his Americanism.

Oh, Mr. President, it seems to me that Senator LODGE owes an explanation to the country as to why this great change has come about in the matter of encouraging differences. He should tell the country why it is that he is now trying to drive a wedge between the American Government and the American people and our allied Governments and our allied peoples, who are striving with one accord to obtain a peace treaty that will do just what Senator LODGE demanded should be done by a peace treaty.

We must remember we are still in a state of war with Germany. It is just as necessary to present a solid front to the enemy as ever.

Mr. President, in the beginning of my speech I said that all people approved Senator LODGE's statement that peace was desirable and that war was undesirable. An apparent exception to that rule is the distinguished junior Senator from Pennsylvania. Most of the Senators opposing the league of nations claim they want to bring about an enduring peace. Not so with Senator KNOX.

He has announced a doctrine and offered a resolution on it that would most likely bring about perpetual war. His proposal is the only proposal that has been made in lieu of the league of nations. It is not a peace proposal at all. It is a war proposal. Of all the remarkable utterances ever made on the question of peace, probably the utterance of Senator KNOX is quite the most remarkable.

His first modest proposal was made on December 18 last, and read, as follow. Listen to this:

Can we not perceive emerging from these facts—

The facts of this war—

a new American doctrine? I will state this great new doctrine in these words: If a situation should arise in which any power or combination of powers should directly or indirectly menace the freedom and peace of Europe, the United States would regard such situation with grave concern as a menace to its own freedom and peace, and would consult with other powers affected with a view to concerted action for the removal of such menace.

Again, on March 1 he said:

Meanwhile our cobelligerents need have no anxiety, for so surely as the sun rises, if the Hun flood again threatens to engulf the world, we shall again be found fighting with the same complete accord, with the cooperation as in the past, all for the defense of civilization.

A few days ago he followed it with a resolution, the last section of which reads as follows:

That, finally, it shall be the declared policy of our Government, in order to meet fully and fairly our obligations to ourselves and to the world, that the freedom and peace of Europe being again threatened by any power or combination of powers, the United States will regard such a situation with grave concern as a menace to its own peace and freedom, will consult with other powers affected with a view to devising means for the removal of such menace, and will, the necessity arising in the future, carry out the same complete accord and cooperation with our chief cobelligerents for the defense of civilization.

This is the plan proposed in lieu of the league of nations by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania. What does that plan mean? Is there any attempt to settle wars in a peaceful way? Is there any attempt to arbitrate differences? Is there any attempt to adjust and compromise and settle international disturbances and disputes? None whatever. The doctrine announced by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania is just a rehash and a restatement of the Monroe doctrine, applying it to Europe. If it were carried out, if that announced doctrine were carried out, we would become simply the chief of police of Europe, mind you, not with agreements that war should not be made, but with an agreement that Europe can stir up all the wars she wants and we will be the policeman and we will stop the wars. Why, if that solution of the junior Senator from Pennsylvania should become the law of the land it would take 5,000,000 American soldiers on guard in Europe all the time to preserve the peace; it would take the largest navy in the world, a larger navy than all the other navies in the world, to preserve the peace of Europe if that resolution should be passed.

No wonder that a reactionary committee, if I may call it that, unanimously turned down this resolution; if not unanimously, then very overwhelmingly. I do not recall. Of course, I am not a member of the committee. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] shakes his head. I imagine by that he means it was a majority, but it was, according to the papers, a very considerable majority that turned it down. No wonder they turned it down, because it would involve us in war. It provides no agreement to keep us out of war. Instead of being a peace treaty, it would be a war treaty, a treaty to incite, to produce, war throughout the world. The remarkable thing about it is that the junior Senator from Pennsylvania, after introducing a resolution like that, is against extending the Monroe doctrine to the world. If we extend the Monroe doctrine to Europe, it seems to me, everybody would say that it might as well be extended to the world, as it is in this peace treaty.

Mr. KING. Will it interrupt the Senator if I offer a suggestion?

Mr. McKELLAR. Not at all; but I hope the Senator will be very brief, because I have in my mind a line of thought which I wish to carry out.

Mr. KING. I think the attitude of the Senator respecting the position of the eminent Senator from Pennsylvania is correct. The Senator might, with equal propriety, have continued and stated that such a policy as that suggested by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania would have prevented the protection of the new governments that will be established—the Polish Government, the Czecho-Slovak and Jugo-Slav nations—and the war would have to be fought over again, or some other war following quickly, unless those Governments are protected and placed upon their feet and put in such a position that they may continue as independent Governments in the family of States of the world.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator for his excellent contribution. I am coming to that in just a few moments. I am going to discuss that a little later in what I have to say.

I now come to the league itself, and I am going to be very brief about it, because it has been gone over by men who are better judges of it perhaps than I am.

The purposes of this league, as set forth in the preamble, are to bring about international cooperation, to bring about international peace, to bring about a better state of feeling, and of dealing one nation with the other to uphold international law and to uphold the inviolability of peace. That is not the wording of it, but that is the substance of it. I read its exact words:

> To promote international cooperation and to secure international peace and security by the acceptance of obligations not to resort to war; by prescription of open, just, and honorable relations between nations; by the firm establishment of the understandings of international law as the actual rule of conduct among Governments; and by the maintenance of justice and a scrupulous respect for all treaty obligations in the dealing of organized peoples with one another.

I wish now to discuss for a moment the components of the league, about which much has been said. In the original number of States that belong to the league there are 32, while 13 others have been invited to come in, nations from all over the world.

The proposed league will include in the beginning 32 members—the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, Cuba, Ecuador, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Nicaragua, Panama, Peru, Uruguay, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Greece, Poland, Portugal, Roumania, Serbia, Australia, New Zealand, India, China, Hedjaz, Siam, South Africa, and Liberia.

The States that have been invited to join the league are Argentina, Chile, Colombia, Denmark, Netherlands, Norway, Paraguay, Persia, Salvador, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, and Venezuela, making 45 in all.

In the first members of the league America has 13 independent States as members, Europe has 10 independent States as members, Asia has 6, Africa 2, and Australia 1. When the 45 come in the division will be 19 American States, 16 European States, 7 Asiatic States, 2 African States, and 1 Australian State. What has America to be afraid of from that kind of a situation? We are on terms of very intimate friendship with all our South American and Central American neighbors. We have nothing to fear from them. Besides, every international league action must be unanimous, as I shall point out a little more accurately in a few moments. Under these circumstances it seems to me that America certainly has not very much to be afraid of. Europe naturally might desire a plurality, but as it is America has the plurality.

The jurisdiction of the league is partly set forth in article 2 as follows:

> Any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the league or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole league, and the league shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations.

In sections 3 and 4 the assembly and the council are given the power to "deal with any matter within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world." These two statements constitute the general scope of the league's jurisdiction.

However, the league is given jurisdiction over the following specific matters:

First. The effective settlement of international disputes which may lead to war, as I shall hereinafter more specifically point out.

Second. It is given, in article 17, jurisdiction over international disputes between a member of the league and a State which is not a member of the league, or between States not members of the league. The league is given jurisdiction to invite the settlement of disputes between such nations upon the same terms upon which members of the league might settle their international disputes. If these nations do not accept such invitation and do not arbitrate or adjust their differences as provided for in the constitution of the league, then the council is authorized to make such recommendations as will prevent hostilities and will result in the settlement of the dispute.

Third. In article 10 the council is given jurisdiction to take such steps as will prevent external aggression upon the territorial integrity and political independence of all members of the league.

Fourth. It is given jurisdiction over those colonies and territories which, as a consequence of the late war, have ceased to be under the sovereignty of the Central Powers, which colonies are required to be governed by mandatories reporting to the league.

Fifth. It is given juisdiction over secret treaties in that no treaty is to be held valid or binding until registered with the secretariat and thereafter duly published to the world.

These are the general powers given to the league. It has also some advisory powers, which are as follows:

First. The council is given the power to formulate plans for the reduction of armaments and for the control of the manufacture of munitions and implements of war. When the council has prepared these plans it submits them to the several Governments and when adopted by the several Governments it becomes operative.

Second. Under article 23 the league is given advisory powers over the following subjects:

(a) Fair and humane conditions of labor for men, women, and children everywhere.

(b) Just treatment of native inhabitants under control of the league.

(c) A supervision over traffic in women and children and traffic in opium and other dangerous drugs.

(d) General supervision over trade in arms and munitions.

(e) Freedom of communication and transit and equitable treatment of commerce everywhere.

(f) Advisory powers over the prevention and control of disease.

In addition to the foregoing specific grant of powers the following statement is found in article 15:

> If the dispute between the parties is claimed by one of them, and is found by the council to arise out of a matter which by international law is solely within the domestic jurisdiction of that party, the council shall make no recommendation as to its settlement.

It will thus be seen that the league of nations has no jurisdiction over any matter that is not international in its nature and over no matter that does not involve a dispute that might lead to war. It has no jurisdiction over any domestic matter or any matter which is declared to be domestic by international law.

Indeed, the peace conference put in the most admirable definition of the kind of disputes the league will settle, made by a distinguished ex-Senator, the Hon. Elihu Root, of New York. This is found in article 13 of the treaty:

> Disputes as to the interpretation of a treaty, as to any question of international law, as to the existence of any fact which, if established, would constitute a breach of any international obligation, or as to the extent and nature of the reparation to be made for any such breach, are declared to be among those which are generally suitable for submission to arbitration.

No internal policy of a nation is in any wise affected. There is no interference with nationalism. There is no interference with any internal affairs or concerns of any nation. The whole jurisdiction committed to the league of nations is over matters that are naturally the subject of treaty.

It is true that an advisory jurisdiction is given over questions of labor, questions of traffic in women and children, questions of public health and harmful drugs and the like, but this is specifically limited to an advisory jurisdiction and is subject to the treaties already entered into and which may be entered into in the future by the several nations composing the league.

That is the whole jurisdiction of this league, the actual and advisory jurisdiction. The actual jurisdiction is over international matters purely. This advisory jurisdiction is rested purely upon treaties between the nations already made and that will be made hereafter, and for that reason this jurisdiction can not hurt this country but will aid it in every way possible, will add to its trade and commerce, and spread its principles of freedom and good government.

We all know how the league acts if a controversy is brought to its attention, but I should have first described the council and the assembly.

The council is composed of nine members, five of them permanent and four of them temporary. The five permanent members are representatives of the United States, England, Italy, France, and Japan; the four others are selected by the assembly, but the first members were elected by the peace council. They are Brazil, Spain, Greece, and Belgium. This council has to act unanimously.

The assembly is composed of representatives of all the nations of the world who are members of the league or who may become members of the league. Each nation has one vote, but may have three representatives. There are a number of questions within the jurisdiction of the council, as I have said, in connection with which either of the parties may appeal to the assembly, and, usually by a majority vote, the assembly either confirms or does not confirm the action of the council.

When an international question comes up, what is the course of action? It may be settled in various ways under the terms of this league. It may be settled in the usual diplomatic way; and if it can be settled through the usual channels of diplomacy, it is done in that way and that ends it. If nations have treaties that provide for courts of arbitration or commissions of arbitration, the nations may submit the controversy to such courts or commissions, and the controversy may be settled by arbitration. If the controversy is not so settled, there is a court of international justice which is established by the league, and international difficulties may be settled in that way. If, however, all these measures fail, nations can carry the controversy to the council. When they carry it to the council, the council must take it up. Briefs may be filed; arguments may be made; the council hears the case and must decide it within a reasonable time—within six months—and no nation can make war until three months after the controversy shall have been decided.

Every fair-minded person must believe—and I do not see how any man can escape the conclusion—that that is a perfectly splendid plan to prevent war. If we had had that plan in 1914 there never would have been this great World War, in which ten millions of young men lost their lives and countless billions of property were destroyed. That is the plain, everyday, carefully worked out method by which these disputes may be settled.

How are the decisions to be enforced? The matter of enforcement is just as simple. As to any member of the league or nonmember of the league, under the conditions which are stated in the league constitution, if a controversy is submitted to the league and unanimously decided by the council against a nation, then that nation, if it is dissatisfied with the decision, may appeal to the assembly. If a majority of the assembly uphold the council, the decision is final and binding, and all members of the league are required to uphold the decision of the council and of the assembly.

The decision is upheld in this way: Trade embargoes, commercial embargoes, and financial embargoes may be instituted against the nation that will not abide by the decree of the league. In my judgment, a trade embargo, a financial embargo, or a commercial embargo will be absolutely effective every time to effectuate the carrying out of the decree of the league, for no nation is going to undertake a trade war or a financial war against the entire world. If, however, that method of enforcement is not effective, then the league has the right to advise what military forces each nation shall produce to uphold the league's decree. Each nation is compelled to furnish such force, and when it is furnished that force is obliged to settle the question. Our Nation, which is the greatest and the strongest and the richest Nation in the world, is not going to undertake to fight either in a trade war or a war of arms with all the world. It is perfectly idle to think that we would do it. We are not going to do it.

For that reason, when the league is established it is going to mean that in the future we are not going to have war. It is going to be effective. It is going to be just exactly like the Constitution of the United States. In 1787, when the Constitution of the United States was framed, men denounced it and said it would not work. They denounced it up to the very time that the number of States necessary to its ratification came into the Union, and in most of the States of the Union the vote as to whether or not the Constitution of the United States should be established was very close. Two, I believe, did not ratify it at all. That was largely because it was said by its opponents that the Constitution would not work. But it has worked, to the betterment of the world and to the peace and happiness and prosperity of the people of this country through all the years. If it is adopted, this league will do the same thing.

What are the objections which have been urged to the league? Our reactionary friends have raised a great many objections to it. Senators will remember that last November and December, before President Wilson left this country, after it was announced that he was going abroad as a member of the peace council, this happened: The reactionaries in the Senate and outside of the Senate, in the newspapers, in the magazines, everywhere they could get an audience, stated that President Wilson was going over there to the peace council for ulterior purposes; that he was going there to establish a superrepublic; that the republic that he expected to establish was going to be over and above all the nations of the world; that he was tired of presiding over a little country like the United States of America; that he wanted a world republic; that he wanted to be the president of it; that this world republic was going to have the power to tax; that it was going to have the only army in the world; and that it was going to have the only navy in the world. How idle were all these assertions—Senators will find the RECORD full of them—which were made by reactionary Senators last fall. Everywhere it was stated that the ulterior purpose of the President in going to Europe as a member of the peace council was that he could set up a world republic.

Was a single prediction fulfilled? Not one. When the draft of the league of nations came in and it was understood what it was, it was discovered that the league did not have any power to tax; it does not have any army; it does not have any navy; and a president is not even provided for, yet those were the criticisms made by the reactionaries who opposed this league before they knew what it was.

After they found out what it was, in a general way, what happened? It seemed to me, after the situation became known, after these objections were proven to be no longer well founded, that its opponents would have withdrawn their objections to the league, but they did not do so. They at once proceeded to urge many new objections to it. The principal objections, as I remember them, were these: That we did not have a right to withdraw under it; that the Monroe doctrine was not taken care of under it; that we would be compelled to be a mandatory, whether we wanted to or not; that we did not have a right to amend it; that the league's action would be by majority vote; that justiciable questions were not stated in it; that domestic questions were not excepted. There were also a number of other more or less important objections to it.

The peace council took up those objections and provided for every one of them. The right to amend was recognized; we have a right to withdraw from the league; the Monroe doctrine is specifically named; justiciable questions are set out; all votes except immaterial ones must be unanimous; no domestic questions can be considered by the league; we can not be required to be a mandatory; all those matters are specifically provided for. Surely, it looked as if there ought not to be any objection to the league after all these amendments to it were adopted, but our reactionary friends were not willing to stop the fight. Every conceivable objection to the league was presented. It is true, they all differed about it themselves, and Mr. Root was sent for to advise leaders. He came to Washington, and, to use a favorite expression of the Secretary of War, Mr. Baker, he began to coordinate and function the objections to the league, as stated by the reactionaries in the Senate, and brought them all down to three. Here are those three, namely, the Monroe doctrine, the right to withdraw, and article 10. The objection as to domestic questions had already been met, so that the three I have named, in substance, are the objections that Mr. Root has stated, and they are the only objections which an effort is going to be made to meet by way of reservations. I wish to discuss those objections for just a moment.

The ones I have named are the only real objections that are now urged. Many have been urged; many have been abandoned; several have been accepted, until now they have sifted down to three. One is as to the right of withdrawal as provided for in article 1; the other is the effect of article 10; and the last is in regard to the Monroe doctrine. I will proceed now to discuss the first objection, namely, that relating to withdrawal. The words, as I remember, are substantially, if not actually, as follows: "Any member of the league may withdraw upon giving two years' notice of its purpose so to do, provided that all of its international obligations and all of its obligations under this covenant are fulfilled at the time of withdrawal."

I heard the speech of the distinguished senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] on the subject several days ago. As I recall his position, he stated that the right to withdraw was absolute, and that the withdrawing nation had the absolute right to determine whether or not its international obligations or its obligations under the covenant had been discharged. I am sorry that I can not agree with the Senator from Virginia on that subject. I do not think that is the real interpretation of that language. I believe that any member of the league has the right to withdraw—there is no question about that—upon giving notice; but as to whether it has performed all of its international obligations or its obligations under the league covenant manifestly the other parties to the contract have a right to say. My proposition is that it is perfectly right that they should have the power to say as to that. We can not be hurt by it. If this Government wishes to withdraw and has entered into an international obligation or an obligation under the league covenant, it ought to fulfill that obligation before it asks to withdraw, and the league naturally would have jurisdiction over that question. If some member of the league should raise the question as to whether the United States in a given case had performed its obligations under the covenant or under international law, there would have to be a unanimous opinion of the body, except for the representatives of the two nations interested in the controversy, and then either side can appeal to the assembly. Surely that is right and fair, and I do not object to that provision of the article. I think that it aids and helps the article.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEW in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. I am glad to hear the Senator discuss that question, because to me it is one of the most troublesome in the covenant. As I understand, the Senator takes the position that we can not determine whether or not our obligations have been fulfilled; that that must be determined by the council or by the assembly?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think so.

Mr. KENYON. I agree with the Senator. Say that we have served notice to go out, and when the two years have expired some other nation takes the position that there are international obligations unfulfilled on our part. We say there are not. There would be a dispute then that might lead to a rupture, and consequently that question must go either to arbitration or to the council.

Mr. McKELLAR. Under the rules of the league.

Mr. KENYON. Yes. If we do not submit it to arbitration it goes to the council. I wish to ask the Senator this question: Suppose the council decides that we have not fulfilled our obligations and can not withdraw, what then? I have never heard any exposition of that. It seems to me that from there on the pathway is perfectly dark; there is no light shining on it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope that I may give the Senator what I think of that, and I hope that my view will be satisfactory to him.

Mr. KENYON. Of course we could go out by force, but we would break a moral obligation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course. On that subject I will say to the Senator that if this Government enters into an international obligation or an obligation under the league covenant, it is its duty to keep it absolutely. I am not talking about the morality of it. I say it is an absolute agreement that ought to be kept, and if the representatives of seven nations that sit on the council unanimously decide that we have broken our covenant or our international agreement, we ought to fulfill it, just as we ought to fulfill any other obligation whether we want to do so or not. I believe in the validity of obligations between individuals, between organizations, and between Governments, and they ought to be fulfilled absolutely.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. I think it must be true that the United States would not seek to go out unless it had fulfilled all its international obligations.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think that is true.

Mr. KENYON. Suppose this country feels that way about it—and there may be a Congress elected on that issue—but other nations that may not have that high sense of honor that we believe the United States has say "You have not fulfilled these obligations," and we say "We have; we are going out," and we go out. Now, what then? Can anybody keep us in?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think we can go out.

Mr. KENYON. Would that, then, be an act of war?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I think not. I think it could only be an act of war when the unanimous opinion of the council held that we had not fulfilled our obligations. I believe that in any dispute that might arise surely we could trust the unanimous verdict of the representatives of the great nations that sit upon this council. If we can not, we ought not to deal with them at all.

Mr. KENYON. Should not they be willing to trust us also that we would not seek to go out unless we had fulfilled our obligations?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think it takes away the strength of the clause, because exactly the same rule that would apply to the United States would apply to Great Britain if she violates it, or to France, or to Italy, or to any other member of the league. Every one of them have to be placed in exactly the same condition that the United States is in about it. I want to say that I for one as an American am perfectly willing to trust this council. We are trusting them in every other international matter. Why can we not trust them in this matter?

Mr. KENYON. Will the Senator pursue just a little further the question that I asked before? Suppose they decide against us and we have a Congress elected on the issue of going out. We feel that our obligations are all fulfilled. We go out. Now, what then?

Mr. McKELLAR. Just exactly the same then that I expect to come to in a few moments.

Mr. KENYON. I will not ask the Senator to anticipate.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I will come to it right now. It is a good illustration.

The legislative and judicial departments of this Government are equal in power, and under our laws certain of our citizens under certain circumstances have the right to sue the United States before our Federal courts. Let us assume that the Senator is a citizen of the United States, and has a just claim against the Government, and sues the Government for a million dollars, and the courts give him a judgment for it, and the case is appealed to the Supreme Court, and a final judgment is entered in his behalf for a million dollars. Suppose it is a great domestic question that the Senator has raised by his suit, and an adverse Congress, unfavorabe to the Senator's claim, has been elected. How is the Senator going to get his money under those circumstances? He can not get it. The Supreme Court has perfect authority to render a judgment against the United States, and whenever the Supreme Court renders a judgment against the United States it is a subsisting and valid obligation of this Government to pay, but it can not be paid until the Congress comes forward and appropriates the money directed to be paid. So the Senator would be in exactly the same position; and that constantly happens. It has occurred in the past that Congress has been exceedingly slow about paying some of these obligations, and it may be in the future that some such cases may arise; but I say to him that under our system of government it is the obligation of Congress to carry out the agreements that are made by the international branch of the Government, if I may so call it—the diplomatic branch of the Government. We constantly speak of our Government being divided into three great branches—the legislative, the judicial, and the executive. As a matter of fact, there are four—the legislative, the judicial, the executive, and the diplomatic; because, as we all know, when the President and the Senate, acting together, make a treaty, it is the supreme law of the land, just as much as any act of Congress, and can be set aside only by the President and the Senate, acting together in that regard, or by a repealing act of Congress.

Now, those things constantly happen. We can not predict them beforehand and say what Congress will do; but whenever a valid agreement is made by the United States Government—I do not care on what issues a Congress has been elected—I believe it will do its duty and perform the obligation that the treaty-making power put upon it when it made the contract.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. As I understand the Senator's position, then, if the council decided that we could not go out of the league, even if a Congress had been elected by the American people on the issue that we should go out of the league, we could not go?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, I think the right to go out of the league is absolute; but the league can make us perform whatever obligations we have agreed to before we go out.

Mr. KENYON. How can it make us perform them? By war?

Mr. McKELLAR. If it is necessary, by war, or by furnishing the necessary troops.

Mr. KENYON. So that if we go out of the league, then, the Senator feels that all of the nations within the league are under some kind of an obligation to make war against us?

Mr. McKELLAR. Not necessarily at all. It depends entirely upon the facts of the given case. I will illustrate to the Senator again about that matter, because this goes to the constitutionality of this provision of the league.

Mr. KENYON. That is what is troubling me.

Mr. McKELLAR. Perhaps I can help the Senator out by another illustration.

The Senator recalls that in 1903, I believe it was, when Mr. Roosevelt was President, the State of Panama seceded from the United States of Colombia, I believe it is called, and, in the ordinary parlance of the papers, one night, or over night, the United States Government entered into a treaty with Panama by which the United States agreed to uphold the territorial integrity of Panama as an independent State, provided that Panama would permit, for a consideration, the building of the Panama Canal. That is familiar to us all. Now, mind you—and this comes more particularly in connection with article 10 than it does with this, but I am trying to answer the Senator's question and relieve him of that trouble if I can—the very statement of the obligation in that case guarantees the absolute independence of Panama. We all know that if it had not been for the statement of that obligation in that treaty, Colombia would have come in the next morning, perhaps, and recovered her lost province; but the very statement of the obligation that the United States would make war on any nation, Colombia or any other nation, that interfered with the sovereignty of Panama stopped any war by Colombia. That does not mean that Mr. Roosevelt and the United States Senate, acting together, as they had the unquestioned power to do, had done an unconstitutional act. That did not mean that the diplomatic branch of our Government, if I may so term it, had guaranteed or had made war in advance—not at all. The President and the Senate had simply agreed that if certain conditions existed the United States would make war.

Now, to answer the Senator's question, we have entered into this obligation, have we not? We have entered into this obligation to uphold Panama. By the way, the Senator will recall that it was a burning question before the American people for a while. You remember that it was attacked on the floor of the Senate as being an unconstitutional act of the President and the Senate, and that it was unconstitutional in that it took away the right of Congress to declare war, and said that this treaty had declared it beforehand. Now, suppose it became a burning issue, and a Congress was elected on that issue, and that issue was that if Panama got into trouble we would not make war. We have the obligation there to make war. If anybody makes war on Panama, we have to go to her assistance. In my humble judgment, whenever that obligation is presented to Congress, Congress is going to carry it out, it does not make any difference what issue was before the people when that Congress was elected.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I do not like to keep interrupting the Senator, and this is the last time I will do it; but if the Senator from Tennessee is correct, then the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is wrong.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think so.

Mr. KENYON. That shows how great minds differ about the questions involved in this league of nations. Now, we less conspicuous Members have to look and do look to the leaders for wisdom. Here is the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], who, in the absence of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] at his summer home now and then, acts as the leader in this fight. He says here very frankly in a statement—and I have studied and meditated over that statement a good deal—that we can go out whenever we choose, after two years, of course; that it is up to this Nation to decide. Now, the Senator from Tennessee says otherwise. Would it not be well to have a question of that supreme importance, that is fraught with trouble for the future, made clear, whichever way is right? If the Senator is right, let us write in that the league of nations is to determine the question of whether we have fulfilled our international obligations; but if the Senator from Virginia is right—and I want to believe he is right, but I fear he is not right—then let us write in that foreign nations shall have nothing to say about when we go out. That would simplify this debate and discussion a good deal.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that if the Senator from Iowa and every other expert in this Senate should get together——

Mr. KENYON. I am not an expert.

Mr. McKELLAR. One moment.

Mr. KENYON. Well, I will not let that statement go unchallenged.

Mr. McKELLAR. I meant that in a proper sense. I think the Senator from Iowa is an expert on any matter that he undertakes to deal with or talk about. He is a man of unusual ability. I believe that if every one in this Senate agreed that this expression used in this part of the treaty was absolutely beyond cavil, the chances would be that in the future it would come up for construction. Every single provision of our Constitution, almost every word in our Constitution, every phrase in our Constitution, every sentence in our Constitution, has had to be construed in the 130 years that have passed since it was made. We can not say in advance what effect this provision or that provision is going to have. If it is wrong we can amend it, just like we have amended our own Constitution. We have amended it eighteen or nineteen times. There are more articles in the amendments to our Constitution than there are in the original Constitution itself. Amendments are provided for in this league of nations covenant. It would be easier to let us try it and work it out, and after we have it worked out, if it needs amending, then let us amend it, as provided in the Constitution.

Mr. President, that brings me to the next proposition, the Monroe doctrine.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the Senator's position to be that if he is correct and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is incorrect about that matter, then we could only be prevented from going out by the unanimous decision of the league that we had not fulfilled our engagements.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator, by the use of the words "unanimous decision," includes, I suppose, the representatives of the United States of America?

Mr. McKELLAR. The league covenant provides that if two members of the council are disputants, those two can not take part in the decision.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is with reference to a matter that is to be decided by arbitration or by submission to the council. In my judgment, that does not apply to this provision of the treaty. It applies only to those provisions where that is made an express condition. My own construction of that would be—and it is an offhand construction; I am not quite sure that I am correct about it—that the unanimous decision required in this case, to the effect that we had not complied with our international engagements, would include, of course, the vote of the member representing the United States. I want to ask the Senator if that is his view about that?

Mr. McKELLAR. The only way that question could arise is this, that some other member of the council or the league would say, "Here is an obligation that the United States has not fulfilled," and the United States would say, "Why, we have fulfilled it," and they would have to submit it to the council and to the league, just as any other question is submitted, in my judgment; and in that case the prosecuting member and the United States would not take part in the deliberations. But my position is that that is right; it ought to be that way.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand that that is the Senator's position.

Mr. McKELLAR. It makes it stronger. I would rather have it that way than to have it so that any nation could withdraw at will, because if any nation can withdraw from this league at will upon giving two years' notice, we have not got any league.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not disagree with the Senator in those conclusions, but I think the Senator is wrong when he assumes that this would create a controversy such as is referred to in article 12 and the other articles requiring, where there is a dispute likely to lead to a rupture, that it shall be submitted to arbitration, and so forth.

Mr. McKELLAR. It may be so.

Mr. SIMMONS. The reason why I think that grows out of the very language of those provisions. The language of those several provisions is about the same. Therefore I need only to read from article 12, which is the first article in which it occurs:

> The members of the league agree that if there should arise between them any dispute likely to lead to a rupture—

And so forth.

I wish to ask the Senator if those words, "if there should arise between them any dispute likely to lead to a rupture," do not refer to a dispute between different nationalities raising such a question as the league would have jurisdiction of with reference to international affairs? Is not that meant there, and not a controversy between a member and the league, as an entity?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am giving the views that I have with a great deal of diffidence, because I can not say that I am correct. The Senator may be entirely correct. I differ with him, and I am trying to be perfectly frank. I think it is a better provision just as it is. That is the only restriction that is in it now. If you can go in and make the obligation and then violate it at will, do you think that is right? I do not think any obligation ought to be violated in that way. I may be wrong about it. The Senator from North Carolina may be right in his view; the Senator from Virginia may be right in his view; but I think it weakens the strength of this agreement to take the view of either the Senator from North Carolina or the Senator from Virginia. I am satisfied with the language as it is. I am more satisfied with the restrictions that I believe are in it, because it treats all nations fairly and justly alike, and it gives us some common forum in which all international matters can be settled.

Mr. SIMMONS and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope Senators will not interrupt for just a few moments. I shall be very glad to go into this just a little later.

Mr. SIMMONS. Just a moment, if the Senator pleases. I think the question that has been raised is important from the standpoint of the view which the Senator has presented. I agree with him in the view he has presented, but the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] has raised the question if a majority of the league should vote that we have not performed our international obligations and we should in defiance of that verdict withdraw anyhow, would it not create a cause of war? If the Senator from Tennessee is correct in his assumption that that would raise one of the questions agreed in article 12 to submit to arbitration, then he has admitted the contention of the Senator from Iowa that it would be a cause of war. I do not think it is a cause of war.

Mr. McKELLAR. Senators may differ about it, but I have that view and I want to submit it to the Senate for what it is worth.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think it refers only to disputes that arise between nations with reference to their relations to each other, not to disputes that arise between a member and the league itself.

Mr. KENYON. Suppose it were something that——

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator pardon me? If that contention be correct, then of course if the United States should withdraw without having fulfilled its obligations it would be guilty of a breach of good faith. I can not conceive that it would ever do that, but I do not think it would be a cause of war. That is the only question that I have raised, and I am not clear about it at all. It just occurred to me to raise it. I was really making the interruption for the purpose of getting advice and information from the Senator who is so ably addressing the Senate at this time.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator's position is correct, then it would be impossible for us to get out of the league of nations. I wish to say in this connection that the position of the Senator from Tennessee, I believe, is exactly the same as the position of the President of the United States and absolutely contrary to the position taken by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I base that on the telegram which the President sent on May 10, 1919, to Secretary Tumulty for publication, which was published in all the papers of the United States. Among other things in that telegram appeared this language:

> Happily, there is no mystery or privacy about what I have promised the Government here. I have promised to propose to the Senate a supplement in which we shall agree, subject to the approval of the council of the league of nations, to come immediately to the assistance of France in case of unprovoked attack by Germany, thus merely hastening the action to which we should be bound by the covenant of the league of nations.

That was the President's position.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I now recall the telegram which the Senator has placed in the RECORD, and I am rather inclined to think that the telegram does uphold the position I take about the meaning of those words.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator permit me just one other word to clarify my position? I am not asserting the position I present as a mature judgment. My own judgment, however, is that that is not one of the questions which we have agreed to submit to arbitration, but if it is one of the questions we have agreed to submit to arbitration and there should be a disagreement about it, of course we would either have to let it go to arbitration or we would have to go to war.

I wish to say to the Senator, in addition, that I have not regarded this provision, even with his construction of it, as a provision of which the United States Government should complain. I think it is in our interest. We will never have a representative upon that board who will violate it; we will never seek ourselves to get out; and we do not want to get out unless we have performed our international obligations; but it is of great importance to the United States that every other civilized nation in the world a member of the league should be bound, before it can go out, to perform its international obligations. If it may result in a little inconvenience at some time to the United States, the resulting benefit in making it necessary for every other nation in the world that is a member of the league to comply with its conditions before it can get out is full compensation to the United States.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the last statement of the Senator from North Carolina, that that will be its effect. That is directly in line with what I believe about it.

I next come to the question of the Monroe doctrine, which has been so often discussed. Article 21 of the league has this to say about the Monroe doctrine:

> Nothing in this covenant shall be deemed to affect the validity of international engagements, such as treaties of arbitration or regional understandings like the Monroe doctrine, for securing the maintenance of peace.

How any reasonable mind after reading that language can come to the conclusion that the Monroe doctrine is not taken care of I can not understand. The Monroe doctrine is simply the expression of the President of the United States in 1823 that we would view with great concern the efforts of any European nation to implant its system upon any territory in this hemisphere. In other words, we simply guarantee by that doctrine the territorial integrity of every nation in this hemisphere. We have held on to that doctrine for nearly 100 years. It has done more to uphold the peace and preserve the territory and the liberty of the various nations of this hemisphere than any other doctrine that was ever announced. This league covenant in terms ratifies it. As a matter of fact, in the first draft the Monroe doctrine was not ratified in terms, though it was ratified in substance; but this later draft does ratify it. At all events, the league applies the Monroe doctrine to all the nations of the world, and it is fitting that that should be so applied.

Article 10, by which it is done and to which I now come, is the keystone of the arch. Without it this league would not have its proper force. Let me state why. We guarantee the territorial integrity of all the nations, and what does that mean? It removes the chief incentive to all war.

Mr. President, as I recall history, and I am speaking very generally now, every international war of any consequence that ever was fought was fought over territory, perhaps with the exception of the famous war between the Greeks and the Trojans, which, as we understand it, was fought over a red-headed woman, Helen of Troy. All other international wars have been fought about territory, and when you remove the power of a great nation to obtain the territory of a weaker nation, when you remove that principal reason for war, you preserve thereby the peace of the world. We have an illustration here now. How easy it would be for this country to overrun Mexico and take it but for the doctrine of Mr. Monroe and of the territorial integrity of the nations of the world.

This article is the keystone of the arch, and that brings me to an interpretation of the article, on which I differ with some other gentlemen. I call attention especially of the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the observations I am about to make on this subject.

Article 10 is composed of two sentences, and I want to read them. They are very short. Article 10 of the league reads as follows:

> The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league.

That is the first sentence, and here is the second:

In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression, the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

I suppose there is not a greater lawyer in this body, and probably not a greater lawyer in the whole country, than the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. His fame is nation-wide. His ability is known of all men as a great constitutional lawyer and any other kind of a lawyer. I approach the proposition of differing with him with the greatest diffidence. As I understood his position the other day, it was that when, in the second sentence of this clause, the council was given authority to advise what means were to be used to carry out or fulfill the obligations of this article, that it only gave a moral obligation to the council to advise; that the council had no authority to enforce the fulfillment of that provision.

I can not agree with that interpretation of these words. I think that interpretation of the words destroys in part the force and effect of the article. I believe that under those words, when the obligation has been created, if the territorial integrity of a nation has been threatened or interfered with, the council has the right to prevent that aggression in such a way as it may direct, and the word "advise" is used for this purpose. The council may say, of course, that the article has been violated, for instance, in the case of Mexico, and we announce that it has been violated. The council makes the statement that they believe all that it is necessary to do is to declare a trade war on the nation that has violated it. They advise that it is not necessary to use military force. Under those circumstances this Government is obligated to enter into a trade war against the nation that has violated the territorial integrity of Mexico. But it may be that the council, upon a careful examination, will find that armed naval forces should be used, and thereupon it would direct that the Governments of the world enforce that article by the use of armed naval forces, or it may be it would require armed land forces or naval forces and land forces; but whenever it advises what the requirement is, it is the duty of this Government to uphold and carry out the requirements of the league. To have any other construction destroys the force and strength of this article.

When we guarantee by treaty the territorial integrity of any nation and provide that armed and naval forces may be used, if necessary, to uphold the determination of the league, that is constitutional. Precisely the same provision is in the Panama Canal treaty with Panama. It is not a moral obligation; it is an absolute obligation; and the Congress, if it does its duty to the American people, must enforce it upon the advice of the league that armed and naval forces are necessary.

That brings me to the next proposition, that the league is neither unconstitutional nor un-American.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Before the Senator passes from the subject which he has just been considering, I inquire of him whether the last clause of article 10 would have any different significance if it read:

In case of any threat or danger of such aggression the council shall direct by what means this obligation shall be fulfilled.

Mr. McKELLAR. Substantially it would be the same, but it would not as clearly express the intent of those who created the article——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I quite agree with the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. For the reason that there are several methods of enforcing this article placed before the league; that is, by financial embargo, by commercial embargo, by trade embargo, and then by armed naval forces or armed land forces. When the word "advise" is used, it is in my judgment used advisedly, because it at once becomes the duty of the council to determine what kind of force—whether financial force or trade force or commercial force or force of arms, either army or navy or air—shall be used for the purpose of carrying out the purposes of the league. Of course, the word "direct" would have in a sense the same effect, but the word "advise" more nearly expresses it.

Mr. President, the objections which have been raised to the league, in my judgment, are frivolous, with the exception of the one against article 10, but article 10 goes to the very life of the league. It is the great rock upon which the league is builded. It is the great power which will keep us out of war, which will preserve the peace of the world. Without it what would become of the nations that we have erected over in Europe? If we do away with article 10, the lust for territory will continue as heretofore, the great nations will oppress the weak, the strong nations will oppress and take territory from their neighbors from whom they think they can take it, just as of old. This article gives great strength and power to the league, and, in my judgment, it is the strongest article in it for the prevention of future wars. We ought to agree to it just as it is, with all the power and authority therein contained. The interpretation given it by the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and, as I understand, concurred in by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and other Senators, all great lawyers, would vastly weaken the power that ought to be had in the league to determine what kind of force shall be used in order to carry out the terms of this article, and with power in the league to direct the use of such means as it advises.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. KING. As I understand the Senator's contention, it is that the article which he is now discussing not only imposes a moral obligation upon every member of the league to adhere to and observe the advice of the council, but also a legal obligation, a legal obligation so strong and imperative in command as to be a compulsion. I did not hear all the Senator's argument.

Mr. McKELLAR. I tried to discuss that in connection with another matter. I doubt if the Senator's distinction between moral obligation and legal obligation is entirely correct. I tried to figure it out on that basis myself and came to the conclusion that it was not sound. For instance, if the Supreme Court of the United States renders a judgment in favor of a citizen for $1,000,000, the Supreme Court has no power to carry it out. The Supreme Court can not furnish the money, the Supreme Court can not appropriate money to pay the citizen, but it makes what? A moral obligation, if you please; a legal obligation, if you please; a governmental obligation, if you please; but whatever it may be called, it is a binding obligation, and Congress is in duty bound to appropriate the money to pay the obligation. So it is with the obligation of article 10. This branch of the Government, the President and the Senate, could not together enforce this league; it is the bounden duty of Congress to carry it out. Whether you call it moral obligation, a legal obligation, or a governmental obligation, or whatever kind of obligation you call it, it is the duty of Congress, of the succeeding Congress or the existing Congress, to carry out that obligation to the very letter, whether it is a declaration of war, a trade embargo, or whatever it is.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator's position, then, would lead, as I apprehend him, this far, that all future Congresses would be compelled whenever the council rendered advice to declare war, if that advice called for the exercise of military or naval force, and therefore it would abrogate that provision of the Constitution which says that Congress shall have the power to declare war.

Mr. McKELLAR. Not at all. The Senator is totally wrong and wholly misconceives my argument. There is nothing unconstitutional about it. The provision, for instance, in the Panama treaty obligates the United States to make war on any nation in the world that makes war on Panama. As we all know, it obligates this Congress or any other Congress to make war against the war-waging enemies of Panama, if there are such. But it is not unconstitutional. Why? Because it is the act of a coordinate branch of the Government, and each Congress passes upon it. All I can say to the Senator is that whenever that obligation is presented to Congress, my faith in the American people, in their uprightness, in their integrity, in their honesty, is such that I believe they will inviolately carry out the obligations of this Government.

Mr. President, having these views, I regard amendments by way of reservations, with the exception of article 10, as frivolous. They mean nothing. The question of article 10 is material, but I think article 10 should be left just exactly as it is. It is the most important article in the treaty for the preservation of peace. I would not want to vote for a league that did not provide for guaranteeing the territorial integrity of every nation. I would not want to vote for a league that did not provide for effectually carrying this provision out. We ought to carry it out in good faith and in honor, and we will do so.

Now for a moment I am going to discuss proposed amendments. I am against any amendment, and I will tell you why I am against any amendment to this league. Of course, every lawyer knows that one of the parties to a contract can not change its terms and preserve the contract. This league has been entered into by all the nations of the world, and whenever we put an amendment in it it destroys the agreement and it has to go back to all the nations that signed it, and unless all sign again there is no agreement. I do not think we ought to do that. If a reservation is put there, if it means anything at all, it means precisely the same thing. Any reservation that has any substance to it will have to go back to the signatory powers and be signed all over again. I am not willing to do that. This league has been made as the result of compromise, of concessions. The great powers of the world—those that saved the world and its civilization in the late war—gathered together in Paris with their best representatives and prepared this league. They yielded and conceded to each other. They have brought forth an admirable instrument. It has been not only signed but it has been approved by the English-speaking peoples concerning whom the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] was so solicitous only a short time ago. It has been indorsed by them. It is going to be indorsed by every civilized nation whose representatives have signed it, and all the peoples of the world are going to indorse it except two factions, and I am not sure that there will be two. The only two factions in all the world to-day that are against this league are a faction in China and a faction in the United States Senate of America. Those are the only two making a combined effort to defeat it. Is it possible that we are going to line up with a faction in China against all the rest of the civilized world? I do not think so.

The only method by which we can secure the world against such an awful sacrifice as has been made in the last five year, as we all know, is the present treaty. It is our duty to ratify it, to uphold it, to stand by it, and defend it.

Now, I want to give the reasons by which I am influenced. There are three incontestable reasons, Mr. President, why this league ought to be established and ought to be ratified by the Senate at the earliest moment possible.

The first of the reasons I am going to state is a financial one. That appeals to most men; I can not say that it ever appealed much to me; but that reason surely should have some weight, and I believe it will. What has been the cost in dollars and cents of the five years of war in which the world has been indulging? It is estimated that there are $800,000,000,000 of wealth in all the world—carry those figures in your mind—$800,000,000,000 of wealth of every kind, nature, and description in all the world. How much of it has been destroyed in the last five years of war which we have had? Two hundred billion dollars of wealth has been destroyed in the last five years; one-fourth of all the wealth in the world has been swept away by the war; and yet reactionaries in the Senate, backward-looking men in the Senate, contend here day after day that we should take no step to avert such an awful sacrifice of property in the future.

A gentleman from Memphis, where I live, Mr. Dorsey H. White, made this illustration to me the other day of the cost of the war to America alone. He is a man of wealth; he has one child, that child being about grown. He said that he had figured out that one-eighth of all his income had been mortgaged to pay the expenses of this war in America in the last two years; that one-eighth of all of his income had been mortgaged for the life of himself and of his child, and if that child lived to be threescore and ten years of age, and then 25 years longer, he estimated it would take one-eighth of his income to pay his proportion of the expenses of the war for the last two years. It also means one-eighth of the income of every man, woman, and child in this country who has an income and pays an income tax will be required to pay the cost of this war. Yet there are Senators here who want to go right along and let nations have all the wars they desire. If this war has taken off an eighth, and we have a war five or six years hence which will take off another eighth, and a war 10 or 12 years hence which will take off a quarter, the first thing we know the American people will not have any income. Therefore I say if we look solely to what it has cost the nations of the world we ought to enter into this league to prevent a repetition of war. If the league does not guarantee that, we ought to do the best we can to help guarantee the world against future wars of this kind.

It has been estimated that this war, without regard to indemnities, has cost Germany thirty-seven and one-half billion dollars; it has cost Great Britain $36,000,000,000; it has cost France in the neighborhood of $30,000,000,000; it has cost the United States in the neighborhood of $30,000,000,000; it has cost Turkey $23,000,000,000; it has cost Italy $10,000,000,000; it has cost Russia $20,000,000,000; it has cost Austria $20,000,000,000; $200,000,000,000 have been swept away; and yet reactionary Senators quibble over what the meaning of words is. Let us quit quibbling; let us do something for the good of humanity; let us stand by the prosperity of the world, and especially of our own people. Let us protect the boys of our great land.

Senators talk about what effect this treaty is going to have in China. Why, Mr. President, in all frankness, I have nothing but the kindest feelings for China, kinder, perhaps, than I have for Japan; but as for me, I think more of the lives of any one of the 60,000 American boys who lie sleeping in Europe forever and of their eternal sacrifice than I do of all the people of China. Let us look at it from an American standpoint, for the defense of American property and of American sons.

That brings me to the second incontestable reason. Mr. President, ten millions of young men have offered up their lives as a sacrifice to the awful monster of war in the last five years; ten millions of young men as full of life and enthusiasm as are any other young men have been cut off before their time, mown down by the ambition of a man like the Kaiser, who was willing to bring about this awful sacrifice of human life in order to get the territory of his neighbors which he desired. When you think of the sacrifice of those ten millions of lives of young men—60,000 of them American boys—do you wonder that I am willing to favor this league, whether it exactly suits China or not? I am not concerned so much about other nations, but I am concerned about the men and women of this country. The 60,000 families of the young men in this country mourning for their sons who have gone forever, the ten millions of families of the young men throughout all the world, are to be considered in this affair. We are here quibbling, we are here disputing, about the effect of a clause of this section and of that section, when we can not say what effect it is going to have or how it is going to be construed in the future, whatever we may say about it. We are, however, here quibbling about it. Do you think that the fathers and the mothers of these 60,000 young men think that way about it? Do you not think that they believe we ought to insert into this league some binding agreement which will prevent war in the future? They want wars stopped. They did not rear their boys to become gun fodder. That is why I am in favor of article 10, because when article 10 is adopted and is established firmly, with the power to carry it out, I do not believe any human monster like Wilhelm of Germany will ever plunge the world into war to gain more territory. The only purpose and object he had was to secure Alsace and Lorraine, or perhaps all of France and Belgium. When you take away from the rulers of the nations the right to make war in order to get territory, you will have done away with war in the world. It is for that reason that I believe that this league should be ratified and adopted without amendment and without reservation.

Now I come to the third reason. The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] last December, when he stated the objects of the peace council, stated that he believed that a new State should be created in Austria to be known as Czechoslovakia; that Poland should be newly created out of a part of Austria and a part of Germany and a part of Russia; that Alsace-Lorraine should be reestablished as a part of France. The peace council have done those things. They have restored a part of Austria to Italy; they have reestablished Poland; and they have taken away Turkish territory and made a new State. Are we reasonable men? Are we thinking about what we are doing at all? Is it possible, is it conceivable, that any fair-minded men on earth would be willing solemnly to come together or to have their nations come together in a council and solemnly rearrange the map and arrange a new Czechoslovakia and a new Poland and yet provide no power to protect those newly created countries in the future? No more awful crime could be committed against the inhabitants of a new Poland or of a new Czechoslovakia or of a new Hedjaz or against the people of Alsace-Lorraine than to mark out their territory, as it is proposed by this treaty to mark it out, and then to turn them over to the tender mercies of ambitious neighboring rulers who want to invade their territory. If we do not enter into this league, and if we do not adopt article 10 of this league, it will not be three months before Poland will be invaded. The only way to safeguard and uphold the new States we have created is to have an agreement among all the nations to protect them.

Mr. President, for these three incontestable reasons I am in favor of this league without reservation and without amendment, for I believe the sooner it is ratified the better.

I next come to a question that I want to discuss very briefly. The newspapers have discussed at considerable extent the question that those who favor our entering this league are not simon-pure, 100 per cent Americans. I do not know how they obtained that idea. No American sovereignty will be violated by becoming a member of this league. It is purely a treaty, just as any other treaty made for the peace of the world or a part of it; and the United States has been making this kind of peace treaties ever since we began as a nation. How there can be involved a contention against the pure Americanism of such action I can not imagine.

I wish to say that if there is a question of Americanism I am willing to submit the Americanism of the present administration and to compare it with the Americanism of any other administration that ever existed in this country. I desire to call attention to what has been done on behalf of America in the last six years.

Mr. President, in the last six years we have won one of the greatest wars that was ever fought among men. That is some accomplishment. Whether reactionaries or progressives, whether Democrats or Republicans, we all take pride in that Americanism; that our boys have won for us the greatest military victory of all the ages.

Less than six years ago the present administration instituted the greatest financial and banking system that has ever been known; a financial system that has made this country free; a financial system under which we have not only been able to finance ourselves but have been able to finance the world in the last five years of this war. Is not that Americanism? In the last five years under this banking system the United States from being the greatest debtor Nation in the world has become the greatest creditor Nation in the world. All men, I think, will agree that that is a great accomplishment.

What has been the next accomplishment? In the last six years we have restored to the seas the American flag which had been absent from them for 50 years. We have the second largest merchant marine in the world to-day. Flags on American ships fly in every port, on every sea; that is a great accomplishment. It seems to me that all fair-minded men will approve the Americanism which has thus been shown in building up our country. More than that, Mr. President, we have not only established the greatest financial system and built up the greatest merchant marine, but the United States has produced more and has had a greater commerce in the last six years than ever before in its history.

More than that, the American people have never been one-half as prosperous as they have been in the last six years. They have enjoyed a prosperity such as not only our Nation has never known before, but there never was such prosperity in any nation under the shining sun. Yet they accuse us of not being 100 per cent American.

Not only that, but while other Governments are trembling in the balance, the American Government to-day is stronger, better, firmer, and more stable than it ever was before in its history. More than that, there never was a day in our history when America was more respected abroad and more honored at home than the America of to-day. Yet they say we are not 100 per cent simon-pure Americans. We have done nothing except to help build up.

Oh, Senators, you can not vote against the proposed league covenant on any such excuse as that it is not American. It is one of the great steps, the last and the greatest of them all, in building up the greatest Nation in the world. Our days of isolation have gone; we can not isolate ourselves from the world any more; we do not want to isolate ourselves from the world any more. Our Nation is at the very forefront of all the nations. We must keep the lead that we have won.

There is then but one last objection—and, by the way, that is the only objection with the exception of the objections voiced by the four Senators whom I named awhile ago, Senators BORAH, BRANDEGEE, POINDEXTER, and REED, who have been against this treaty all the time—and I am going to tell the truth about it right now. I say to you that that objection is the hatred you reactionary Senators have in your hearts for Woodrow Wilson, the President of the United States. Those of you who are opposing it, those of you who are asking for reservations, those of you who are asking for amendments, search down into the bottom of your hearts, look into them fairly and squarely, and you will find that it is your opposition to the President of the United States that causes you not to be for it. Nine-tenths of you were loud in your demands for a league of nations until you found that Wilson was really going to secure one, and to-day in your home States you contend you are in favor of a league, and you just want to amend this.

The President of the United States has taken the leading part in creating it; he has been at the forefront of the fight; he has done his full duty; he has brought about the best instrument possible; he is the leading figure in the world to-day, and some men are jealous of him, and they do not want to uphold him or to ratify this league because he made it. I say to you that, in my judgment, the President of the United States has his faults, as all men have, but he has done a wonderful work for this country. Under his administration this country has prospered as it never prospered before; it is more honored abroad—I do not care what some may say about it—and more respected and prosperous at home than it ever was in any 25 years together of its history in the past. There is prejudice against him, yes; but his work has been a wonderful work, and it seems to me that any American citizen with the red blood of this country running in his veins must know that the President has been actuated by no selfish purpose, but has been looking alone to the good of his country and to the good of humanity and to the effective securing of the peace of the world. He has worked it out. It is the result of compromise. It ought not to be amended, and there ought not to be any reservations made to it.

Reactionary Republicans or reactionary Democrats who are opposing this league, let me appeal to you—do not let your hatred of any one man warp and set aside your judgment on this most far-reaching agreement of all the ages.

Under Mr. Wilson's administration we have progressed as never before in our history; we have prospered as never before in our history. We have become a world power faster than in any other like period in our history. He has led in every progressive undertaking; he has led in the recommendation of more remedial and progressive laws than have ever been enacted by the Congress in the same period of time in our history. He has upheld our institutions at home and upheld our honor abroad, and to-day the name of America is respected, admired, and esteemed by liberty-loving men and women and by fair-minded men and women all over the world. All of his work has been for America; all of his work has been practical as well as ideal, and the crowning work of his career is this peace treaty, which, in my humble judgment, should be unanimously approved by this body. Let not America, which has given this great peace covenant to the world, be the only one to repudiate it.

I thank the Senate.

PROPAGANDA ON PACKING INDUSTRY.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I would not feel justified in taking the time of the Senate were it not that the country ought to know, if it is possible to get anything into the newspapers now concerning the packers, as to the propaganda they have instituted against certain bills now pending in Congress. I am not going to speak upon the league of nations, but I am going to speak upon this subject.

I believe the people of the United States are as interested in the question of the high cost of living as they are in the question of the league of nations, and possibly more so. I believe they are looking to the American Congress to take some action on that question. Senators are troubled as to what they can do, and so are Members of the House of Representatives. It is not an easy question. I have very serious doubt about our being able to do much, if anything. The only propositions within my knowledge pending in the American Congress looking to some action along this line are two bills, one introduced by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] and one by myself. I regret that the Senator from Wyoming is not present.

A feeling of unrest among the American people due to the high cost of living is, or ought to be, a matter of concern to Congress. It is quite apparent that the pathway of the two bills referred to will have a few rocks in it and a good many thorns along the edges. If you ever wish to mass mighty forces in this country, just undertake to introduce bills of the character of those I have in mind. Those bills have not as yet been considered by the committee and will not be considered by the committee for at least a month; but I have telegrams here finding fault with Congress for permitting such bills even to be introduced.

A propaganda has been started, as I have heretofore stated on this floor, the like of which has never been seen in this country. The same situation arises as when Congress undertook to act on the railroad question. At that time men stood back and said: "Congress can not interfere with private business; that is our concern"; but that battle was fought out at that time. The telegrams and letters now coming in indicate that the packers and those whom they can control are in the same condition of mind, for they have become as powerful in this country as the railroads were at the time the fight to control the railroads was inaugurated. I know that in those days anybody who said the railroads ought to be controlled was called a "railroad baiter," and now the men who feel that the packers have reached a position in this country where they absolutely menace independent business are called "packer baiters"; they are met with sneers and slurs, while the cajolery and flattery of the sycophants of the big business interests of this country surround other men and lead them to believe that we had better be very careful in what we do with the big interests of this country, and the statement is made that we are undertaking to war on great business. Not at all. Nobody wants to hurt legitimate business in this country.

Many of the telegrams and letters that come to me state: "We have had enough of Government ownership of business in the case of the railroads." That is one of the issues that is raised. The bills to which I have referred, however, are not bills for Government ownership of the packers; they are bills for Government control and regulation. No business yet has gotten so powerful in this country that it can stand up and say to the people: "How we conduct our business is none of your affair." When any concerns in this country have become so powerful that they are going into lines of unrelated business and practically controlling everything the people have to buy to live, they can not stand up and say: "It is none of your affair how we run our business."

What was the reason for the introduction of these bills? The Federal Trade Commission, a somewhat unpopular institution in certain quarters in this Chamber, so unpopular that a fight had to be made to preserve its appropriation, made an investigation of the packers. I do not know whether that investigation was made at the request of the President, although I am inclined to think it was, but, in any event, they made the investigation. They submitted two reports; one is of recent date, being of July 3, 1918. I am going to put this report into the RECORD. The Senator from Utah has placed in the RECORD to-day the answer of Mr. Swift, one of the packers, to this report. In their letter to the President some of the things set forth and some of the reasons given for proper governmental control are these:

It appears that five great packing concerns of the country—Swift, Armour, Morris, Cudahy, and Wilson—have attained such a dominant position that they control at will the market in which they buy their supplies, the market in which they sell their products, and hold the fortunes of their competitors in their hands.

Not only is the business of gathering, preparing, and selling meat products in their control, but an almost countless number of by-product industries are similarly dominated; and, not content with reaching out for mastery as to commodities which substitute for meat and its by-products, they have invaded allied industries and even unrelated ones.

Again further in that report they say:

The producer of live stock is at the mercy of these five companies, because they control the market and the marketing facilities, and to some extent the rolling stock which transports the product to market.

The competitors of these five concerns are at their mercy because of the control of the market places, storage facilities, and the refrigerator cars for distribution.

The consumer of meat products is at the mercy of these five because both producer and competitor are helpless to bring relief.

That is what the commission said to the President of the United States after months of investigation; but the only way this is ever met on the floor or anywhere else is to try to discredit the membership and the personnel of the Federal Trade Commission. The American people, however, have as much confidence in the Federal Trade Commission as they have in the Senate of the United States, and the effort to discredit them will not succeed.

Again they say:

Out of the mass of information in our hands one fact stands out with all possible emphasis. The small dominant group of American meat packers are now international in their activities, while remaining American in identity. Blame which now attaches to them for their practices abroad as well as at home inevitably will attach to our country if the practices continue. The purely domestic problems in their increasing magnitude, their monopolization of markets, their manipulations and control, grave as those problems are, are not more serious than those presented by the added aspect of international activity. This urgently argues for a solution which will increase and not diminish the high regard in which this people is held in international comity.

Again:

The commission, through Mr. Heney, had to meet deliberate falsification of returns properly required under legal authority; we had to meet schools for witnesses where employees were coached in anticipation of their being called to testify in an investigation ordered by you and by the Congress of the United States.

So the investigation was ordered by the President.

We had to meet a situation created by the destruction of letters and documents vital to this investigation; we had to meet a conspiracy in the preparation of answers to the lawful inquiries of the commission.

In the report to which I have referred, of which the letter to the President is a part, they point out that the five great packers jointly or separately wield controlling interest in 574 companies, minority interest in 95 others, and undetermined interest in 93, a total of 762 companies, and that they produce or deal in some 775 commodities, largely food products.

In addition to meat foods, they produce or deal in such divers commodities as fresh tomatoes and banjo strings, leather and cottonseed oil, breakfast foods, vin fizz—curled hair, pepsin, and washing powders. Their branch houses are not only stations for the distribution of meat and poultry, but take on the character of wholesale grocery stores, dealers in various kinds of produce, and jobbers to special lines of trade.

Again, as to financial power, the report in part says:

The packer has drawn to a marked degree upon the banks of the country for liquid funds * * * he could not operate on the scale he does without the very large loans furnished by the banks. To assure himself loans ample to his purpose, the big packer has secured affiliation through stock ownership, representation on directorates, and in other ways with numerous banks and trust companies. Mr. Armour, Mr. Swift, Mr. Morris, and Mr. Wilson are directors in banks affiliated closely with those who are strong at the sources of credit in the United States. Being thus allied with the powerful interests at the sources of credit, the packers' power is great, not only for financing their own national and international operations, but for affecting, for good or for ill, the credit of cattle producers and of competitors or customers in any line.

Again, and I am still reading from the same document:

The reason why the packers are seeking control of the substitutes for meat—the foods that compete with meats—are obvious. If the prices of substitutes for meats are once brought under packer control, the consumer will have little to gain in turning to them for relief from excessive meat prices.

Again:

Judged conservatively by trade estimates, the Big Five handle at least half of the poultry, eggs, and cheese in the main channels of interstate commerce. Most estimates place the total production in dressed poultry and eggs controlled by the packers at a higher percentage.

And so it goes. They are in canned fruits, vegetables, groceries, wool, rice, banks, peddler car routes, refrigerator transportation, control of stockyards; and so they have grown on, as this report shows, into an institution of tremendous and far-reaching power.

The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, in considering the Kendrick bill at the last session, had very illuminating hearings. I suppose few Senators have ever read them; but these facts being apparent to certain men, not wholesale grocers—for I never talked to one of them in my life about this bill, and I am sure the Senator from Wyoming did not—we introduced these bills to meet, as we thought they would meet, the situations that are presented in these documents that I have read and in the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry—more in the hearings than in these documents.

Now, what happened? Those bills were introduced on the 23d day of June. I am not going to enter into any minute discussion of the bills. There are perfectly legitimate objections to those bills, of course, in the minds of men who have no connection with the packers. Men who believe that the Government has nothing to do with private business, of course, object to them; men who honestly may object to the license system—and if they have any better method of handling the matter, let them bring it forward. So I have not any quarrel with those who are objecting to the methods of these bills and I have no quarrel with those who wire Members of Congress or work up propaganda to send in here to Members of Congress; but it is fair and right that Congress should know that what they are getting is so worked up.

Now, immediately they commenced to reach out to these various lines of industry, where they are powerful, the Thomas E. Wilson Co., on July 14, sent out a circular letter to their stockholders. I will place this in the RECORD. I do not want to encumber the RECORD with a mass of things, but I will try to pick out a few and put them in. They inclose a synopsis of this bill, and they wind up by saying:

As an investor, we believe you are interested in this proposed legislation, and it would seem to us that it might be helpful to your Senator and Congressman to have the benefit of your views upon this important subject.

That goes to the stockholders of Wilson & Co. on July 14. Bear in mind the date.

Swift & Co., on July 12, sent out a similar notice to their shareholders—I am not objecting to this, but we ought to know it—in which they urge them to write to their individual Congressmen and Senators and urge them to make a complete and thorough investigation before legislating upon this subject, and urge them to oppose the pending ill-advised and destructive legislation. That goes to all the Swift stockholders, 25,000 of them in the country. They also write to the banks. I have here a letter written on July 12 by the Cudahy Packing Co. to a Michigan bank urging them to get busy on this question; and they also say:

You may wish also to give your views to the local chamber of commerce and to the editors of your local newspapers.

There never has been such a campaign of attempt to debauch the American press—advertisements running into enormous sums, letters to the "Dear Folks" about how cheap and how fine the Wilson brands are. I hesitate to say what the evidence disclosed before the Agricultural Committee as to the amount of money being spent by the packers in advertisements, many of them for no purpose but to sway editorial opinion; and you will not find in the great mass of newspapers in this country much discussion of these packer bills, or anything said about them. Thank God, there are some papers that can not be influenced by advertisements.

That was the letter that the Cudahy people sent out to the banks, to "get busy in the chambers of commerce" and get their support.

Then Morris & Co., on July 12, sent out a letter along the same line. These letters and circulars, as will be observed, all went out within a space of two or three days. Then the flood of telegrams and letters commenced to pour in on Congress, just about the time these letters and these circulars got out around the country.

That was not all. They called in their employees at certain places just about this time and sent them out to the retail merchants with petitions and prepared letters to send in to Members of Congress, and telegrams, at their expense. Not only that, but they had some orators connected with their organization; and I am tracing now just the sources of inspiration for these telegrams.

I have here the Stamford Advocate, of Stamford, Conn., Thursday, July 17, 1919; and Senators will discover probably that after this speech at Stamford they received a large and choice assortment of telegrams.

DENOUNCES KENYON BILL—MR. GRIFFITH INTERPRETS PENDING MEASURE FOR KIWANIS CLUB.

The Kiwanis Club had lunch to-day at noon in the Davenport. The Rome Furniture Co. provided souvenirs in the form of clothes brushes. John C. Lee provided a box of Darby and Joan perfectoes, and the club had an attendance prize in the form of a box of cigars, which was won by E. W. Lockwood, who at once opened the box and treated the club.

The speaker of the day was H. M. Griffith, of the New York office of Armour & Co., who said in part:

"I thank you, gentlemen, for the opportunity of appearing here and bringing to your attention a most vicious bit of Federal legislation. I refer to the bill now known as the Kenyon bill. I shall endeavor to give a brief résumé of this remarkable bill, and regret that the time does not permit of a more exhaustive analysis.

Then he goes ahead to analyze it, and he ends with these words:

"Men of this club, the packing industry is the most regulated industry in the world. Stripped of all camouflage, this bill of Senator KENYON is a bill for Government ownership.

He deceived the Kiwanis Club in that respect.

"It is a bill for inefficiency. The Government as administered by Washington, Adams—

I should not have referred to that.

"Monroe, Lincoln, and McKinley is good enough for me!

That is the kind of a Government we are trying to keep; this, and not a Government of the packers. I realize that references to Washington may be somewhat out of place.

"Look deeper—

He said, in this magnificent peroration—

"Look deeper and you will see that this bill is an attempt to substitute the red flag of socialism for the American flag. Bolshevism is spewing its vermin into the minds of the American people.

"I say that the Government of Lincoln is good enough. How about you, gentlemen?"

On motion of Mr. Morehouse it was voted that the club telegraph both the Senators and the Congressmen that it is opposed to the Kenyon bill. The motion was carried without a dissenting vote.

A quick response from Congress:

Mr. Morehouse then read a letter from Congressman SCHUYLER MERRITT, informing the club that he would vote against the bill.

The next lunch of the club will be held at the home of the Stamford Yacht Club next Thursday.

Somebody is going to have something to say in this country about controlling prices besides the members of the Kiwanis Club and the Stamford Yacht Club. But this reference to anarchy and socialism so stirred up the community that telegrams poured in here protesting against the bill, one of them from a policeman, who feared what it was going to do in the way of bringing about anarchy.

Mr. BORAH. Where is the Kiwanis Club located?

Mr. KENYON. In Connecticut. This is from Stamford, Conn., and there are a large number of telegrams that were sent in from Stamford, Conn.

Then they also sent out a blank affair through their salesmen and branch houses asking questions. I place one in the RECORD:

Branch house _____ Salesman _____

Hon. A. J. GRONNA, chairman Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, Washington, D. C.

Mr. President, I should like to put in the RECORD the letter from Thomas E. Wilson to the stockholders of Wilson & Co.; the letter from the Cudahy Packing Co. to the bond and note holders of the Cudahy Packing Co.; the letter from Swift & Co., through their secretary, to their stockholders; and the letter to the banks. I will hand them to the reporter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CHICAGO, U. S. A., July 14, 1919.

To the stockholders of Wilson & Co.:

As a stockholder of Wilson & Co. you have a voice in its management and a share in its earnings, therefore I feel you are entitled to know that pending legislation in Congress, if enacted into law, will be of considerable interest to you and to American business generally.

We are inclosing herewith for your consideration a synopsis of bill S. 2202, introduced last month by Senator W. S. KENYON, of Iowa. This bill is a fair example of others now pending in Congress. The Kenyon bill proposes to license the packers and places autocratic power over the industry.

Should this bill become a law it must be apparent that the Department of Agriculture will be given powers heretofore unheard of in American industry, practically placing our business in the hands of subordinates of that department. If this is brought about, there can be no doubt that the efficiency of the meat-packing industry will be impaired, resulting only in increased costs to the ultimate consumer.

These bills also provide that the packers shall be deprived of their ownership of refrigerator cars and of their interests in stockyards, and further limits their operations, which can result in nothing but reduced efficiency and an increased cost and difficulty in the distribution of our products.

This control is given by the establishment of a dangerous licensing system which in the course of time may become applicable to any other business.

As an investor we believe you are interested in this proposed legislation, and it would seem to us that it might be helpful to your Senator and Congressman to have the benefit of your views upon this important subject.

Very truly, yours,

THOS. E. WILSON,
President.

CHICAGO, July 11, 1919.

To our bond and note holders:

We inclose for your consideration a synopsis of bill S. 2202, introduced last month by Senator KENYON.

This bill is a fair example of other bills now pending in Congress. It proposes to license the packers and place autocratic power over the industry in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture. It would deprive the packers of the control of their refrigerator cars, force them to dispose of their stockyards interests, and also aims to preclude them from engaging in any other business or in the sale or manufacture of any food product other than live-stock products.

Probably no industry is operated to-day more efficiently than the packing-house industry, or on so small a margin of profit on the turnover.

Should this bill become a law, the powers conferred on the Department of Agriculture would virtually place the industry in the hands of subordinates in the Agricultural Department; the efficiency of the industry would be impaired, and the final result would be unsatisfactory service and increased cost to the consumer.

We consider Government interference in private business, to the extent contemplated in this bill, unwarranted, and feel assured that if the packing industry comes under license it will only be a question of time before all large industries are similarly handicapped—something which would undoubtedly lead to industrial disorder and national disaster.

We think it highly desirable, in your own interest as a security holder, therefore, that you take the matter up, either personally or by letter, with your Representative and Senators in Congress, protesting against this bill; also against bill S. 2199, introduced by Senator KENDRICK, and against all other similar measures.

Kindly give this your early attention, as prompt action is necessary.

Respectfully,

THE CUDAHY PACKING CO.

CHICAGO, ILL., July 12, 1919.

To the shareholders of Swift & Co.:

We believe that it is the duty of every shareholder of Swift & Co. to pay attention to the present situation with regard to the proposed legislation affecting the packing industry.

There are pending in the United States Senate two bills—one the Kendrick bill, introduced on June 23, known as S. 2199, and the other the Kenyon bill, introduced on the same day, and known as S. 2202. We are inclosing a summary of the Kenyon bill, which typifies the proposed legislation.

These bills are revolutionary, in that they propose to place legitimate business under a Federal license which may be arbitrarily revoked at any time, and they vest the blanket powers of directing and controlling all our operations in the hands of a Government agent who may know nothing about the business.

One of these bills specifically gives the Government the extraordinary power to say what commodities a licensee may or may not sell; the other bill probably gives the same power under its general license provisions.

These bills also provide that the packers shall be deprived of the control of their refrigerator cars and of their interests in stockyards. This will result in reduced efficiency and an increased cost and difficulty in the distribution of our products.

If these bills are passed, no business will be free from the menace of autocratic, irresponsible, bureaucratic control. They should be opposed by every investor in every industrial enterprise, and by everyone who believes that the public interests are best served by industries under private rather than Government management.

We are confident that if given an opportunity this industry can readily prove that the proposed legislation is vicious. It is for this reason that we believe it to be your duty to interview or write your individual Congressman and your Senators to urge them to make a complete and thorough investigation before legislating upon this subject, and to urge them to oppose the pending ill-advised and destructive legislation.

Yours, truly,

SWIFT & CO.,
By F. S. HAYWARD,
Secretary.

If anyone wishes to read the complete bill, copy will be furnished on request.

CHICAGO, July 12, 1919.

DEAR SIR: We are inclosing a summary of a bill introduced in the United States Senate, which, we believe, would set a precedent for licensing and restricting all sorts of businesses.

The inclosed summary indicates the adverse effects of this legislation on the packing industry, including live-stock commission men, packers, interstate dealers in meat products, and others. You will notice that the measure proposes an elaborate licensing system and places the issuance and revocation of licenses almost wholly within the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture.

If an employee or agent, without his principal's knowledge, fails in a single instance to comply with any of the complex regulations, the license may be forfeited.

Restrictions embodied in the bill limit the products which may be handled to a single sort. These provisions threaten economies and efficiency evolved from long experience.

May we ask that you consider the measure earnestly, then if you agree with us that it would be harmful to American industry and American business, will you not personally communicate your opinion to your Senators or Representatives in Congress, in order that they may realize how business men look upon the legislation now proposed? You may wish also to give your views to the local chamber of commerce and to the editors of your local newspapers.

You may find it convenient to mention the Kenyon bill as bill S. 2202. It is quite similar to the bill which Senator KENDRICK has introduced, S. 2199, and to Representative LEVER'S bill, H. R. 5310.

Yours, very truly,

THE CUDAHY PACKING CO.,
JNO. E. WAGNER, Treasurer.

Mr. KENYON. I also wish to insert in the RECORD another statement they send out on this legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CHICAGO, July 12, 1919.

We are sending you with this letter an outline of a bill which, in our opinion, threatens the independence, enterprise, and efficiency of American commerce and industry. It does this by setting a precedent of laws licensing and restricting all sorts of businesses.

The bill we have summarized provides that members of a large American industry, famous for its efficiency under its present organization, shall operate under a Federal license. Under this bill the power to issue or withdraw license would be placed almost entirely within the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Furthermore, this bill, which was introduced by Senator KENYON, of Iowa, limits the companies affected to one kind of product. These restrictions would lower efficiency. While it is true that the Kenyon bill specified only the packing industry, yet the principle involved is applicable to every business. It is essentially a barrier to business enterprise and is opposed to the spirit by which American institutions have been developed.

We would appreciate your consideration of the proposed legislation and in all of its aspects. If you conclude that it embodies a dangerous principle, we hope that you will say so at once to your Senators and Representatives at Congress. Your views would gain even more force if they were communicated also to the newspapers of your city, to your business associates, and to your local trade organization.

The proposed laws are embodied in three bills—the Kenyon bill, S. 2202; the Kendrick bill, S. 2199; and the Lever bill, H. R. 5310.

Yours, truly,

C. M. MACFARLAND,
Vice President and Treasurer.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. Buckingham, the manager of the Union Stock Yards Co., at Omaha, which is controlled by these gentlemen, gave out an interview in the Omaha Bee:

Mr. Buckingham ridiculed the recent efforts of Senator KENDRICK, of Wyoming, and Senator KENYON, of Iowa, in presenting bills in Congress calling for Federal control of the packing industry, describing the bills as "fads," "ideas," and "theories" of day-dreaming politicians.

"The packing business is the largest single business in the world."

Then he is inquired of concerning these bills.

"If the change comes"—

Referring to divorcing the packing houses from the stockyards—

"what will be the effect?" Mr. Buckingham was asked.

Now, listen:

"There won't be any change," Mr. Buckingham replied. "The stockyards and packing houses will operate just the same as usual. The yards company can be 100 miles away from the packing center, so far as we are concerned, and the industry would progress as usual. The packing business is as large as the Government itself, and it is foolish for a lot of grandstanders to theorize on how it shall be conducted."

That is the question. Maybe he is right. Maybe this arrogance of power is such that they can be as brazen about the proposition now as they desire. Maybe, with all of this control, reaching into banks and industries and railroads everywhere in this country, they are as strong and powerful as the Government of the United States. Maybe, with the Senators who rush to their defense whenever there is anything said about them, their power may be even greater than we dream of. That is the question that the American people are going to determine. It is a good deal like the general manager of the International Harvester Co., who is reported to have said the other day, when there was a strike and he refused to open up—so the papers reported it; I hope it may not be true—"You wanted a closed shop. You have got a closed shop now, and it will stay closed until you come to our terms," or substantially that.

Gentlemen had better have a little vision in this country, Mr. President. They had better hear some of the voices in the air in this country, as well as through the world; and these gentlemen who believe that they can grow so powerful in monopolizing the things that the people of this country may have, and that Congress dare not say a word to them to control them, had better beware.

Then there came a deluge of telegrams, just like a mighty telepathic wave. All over this country it was discovered that the Kendrick bill was going to ruin the stockmen of the country. There is not a greater stockman in this country, nor a more honorable man, nor one who understands this business better, than the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK]. He is out there now, attending to his great stock interests. Telegrams come from Utah, saying that this is going to ruin the stock business. There is not any business on earth, according to these telegrams, that is not going to be ruined by the Kendrick bill, if it is passed.

Here is a telegram from Savannah, Ga.; and I say now that you can take the map of these different States, and you can pick out one town and the telegrams and letters that come in from that town on a certain day, and then you can figure out just about the distance a man would travel the next day, and then you will find them coming in from that town, if you just follow the map through Kentucky and Tennessee and other States. These telegrams are to the distinguished chairman of the committee, who has kindly permitted me to use them.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if he has any information as to who pays for this enormous mass of telegraphic matter?

Mr. KENYON. I have.

Mr. THOMAS. Is the Senator prepared to inform the Senate?

Mr. KENYON. I am, just as soon as I can reach it, and show the Senator the absolute forms that were prepared, with the Senator's name, and even what should be said to him.

Mr. THOMAS. The forms of the telegrams I have received are nearly all identical.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have received a great many telegrams, apparently for the most part alike. One day I will get 40 or 50 from Memphis, and another day 40 or 50 from Chattanooga, or maybe 100; more from Chattanooga than anywhere else. Again, Nashville will have a day, and I will get a great many from Nashville. Has the Senator any information in reference to how it happens that a peculiar propaganda is started in that way, and upon whom it operates?

Mr. KENYON. The Senator surely does not think it could be a propaganda. Of course, it is merely the spontaneous outburst of the minds of all of the American people against this throttling of their business, and it happens on almost the same day. It is the most wonderful psychological event that ever has been exhibited to the world.

Here is a telegram from Savannah, Ga., protesting against the Kenyon and Kendrick bills as being un-American. That is dated the 18th, just about time for these circulars to reach there.

From the same place, and on the same date, a telegram protesting against the Kendrick and Kenyon bills as unconstitutional. Another protesting against the Kendrick and Kenyon bills as being detrimental to retail merchants.

Here is a telegram from Gladstone, Mich., saying:

We protest against the Kenyon bill. This is no time to experiment with Government operation. From our experience in the meat business, we do not want Government control.

I will not read the signatures. They are here if any Senators want to examine them.

Another:

We protest against the Kenyon bill. This is no time to experiment with Government operation. From our experience in the meat business, we do not want Government control.

There are two minds there that work out in absolutely the same way, and use the same language.

Another one:

We protest against the Kenyon bill. This is no time to experiment with Government operation. From our experience in the meat business, we do not want Government control.

And another one just exactly like it from another place—the same language from different places. What humbug, to try and influence Members of Congress by that.

Seattle, Wash., seems to have become tremendously excited over this matter; and on the 18th, just about time for the circulars to get out there, telegrams of this kind commenced to pour in on the chairman of the committee:

Opposed Kenyon bill licensing packers. Legislation this character fosters unrest and Bolshevism. Am willing come Washington testify connection Kenyon bill.

Again, from Seattle:

The proposed Kenyon bill, if passed, would be very unsatisfactory to myself, as it should also be in the eyes of any intelligent American citizen who wishes to make his home in a free country among liberty-loving people.

Rainier Packing Co.—I do not know anything about it, but I will gamble that that is a concern controlled by some of the five big packers.

Here is another telegram from Seattle:

Kenyon bill licensing packers unfair, un-American. Kill it.

Another one wires from Seattle:

I am opposed to Kenyon bill, regulating the meat industry of the country. It is the most dastardly thing ever perpetrated on the American people

Here is another one from Seattle:

Am opposed to Kenyon bill. Absolutely unconstitutional.

Why, these people, bless their souls, never saw the bill, never looked into it, and do not know anything that is in it.

Here is a telegram from another gentleman in Seattle:

Absolutely against proposed bill licensing packers. Since when have American people lost the right to conduct their own business as they see fit?

That is the point; they have lost it. When any business becomes such a monopoly that it threatens the very life of the people of the country, they have lost that right. That doctrine has gone, and it is not Bolshevism to say so, either.

Another reads:

I am not in favor of Kenyon-Kendrick bill, which I think jeopardizes American liberty, and certainly hope the committee will not be influenced by such socialistic ideas.

These telegrams are all along about the 16th to the 18th, three and four days after the circular letters to which I have referred were sent out.

Again:

If measures such as Kenyon bill be allowed to pass, where are our much talked of rights as American citizens?

Where are they? That is the question.

To say I am opposed to it is putting it much too mildly.

Here is a Stamford telegram. After the wonderful speech at the Kiwanis Club and before the Stamford Yacht Club, then we will be getting more telegrams. Here is a telegram from a judge in Stamford. He signs it "Judge." I have always been suspicious of the legal ability of a man who signs his personal letters as judge, but that should receive great weight with you.

Hope you can use your efforts to defeat Kenyon-Kendrick bill now before United States Senate. We do not want such action in this glorious country.

Another one, this from Seattle again:

I am opposed to the Kenyon bill in regard to Government licensing industry. Let it alone.

Ah, that is it.

Here is a very amiable man from Seattle, who says—and it costs money to send these dispatches from Seattle:

I can not conceive why such a measure as proposed Kenyon bill has been allowed to be introduced. Am unalterably opposed to it.

That is by Charles Gearhart, coffee restaurant. There is an aroma of strength about that telegram. [Laughter.] This gentleman can not understand why such a measure should be allowed to be introduced in the American Congress. Charlie had better keep to his coffee business and let the packers pay for his telegrams.

Here is another one from Seattle:

I am opposed to passage or even consideration of Kenyon bill licensing packers, an infringement upon American liberty.

So much for Seattle.

Here is West Virginia, having caught this same spirit:

Somebody having a little stock has gone to this gentleman named Gum and told him to stick to this thing and send in a dispatch; so Mr. Gum sends this dispatch from Ronceverte, W. Va., July 15:

Kenyon and Kendrick bills regulating packers should be dismissed.

He thinks this is a court action.

Mr. THOMAS. The gentleman may regard your bill as a bill in equity.

Mr. KENYON. He has gummed it up a good deal.

From Clifton Forge, Va., see this bunch of telegrams:

Kenyon and Kendrick bill relative to meat should not be passed.

That was July 14. Here is another one:

Kendrick and Kenyon bill—

They change it just a little—relative to meat should not be passed.

July 14, another one:

Kendrick and Kenyon meat bill should not be passed.

Another one from Clifton Forge:

Kenyon and Kendrick meat bill should not be passed.

It is wonderful how these people all agree down there in Virginia. Here is another one. Notice the difference:

Kenyon and Kendrick meat bill should not be passed.

Here is another one from the same place, July 14. Note that:

Kendrick—

Not Kenyon and Kendrick, but—

Kendrick and Kenyon bills relative to meat should not be passed.

You can not fool these boys. They know how to do this. They will change a few words and then nobody in Congress will ever suspect them. They are wise boys.

Then another one:

Kendrick and Kenyon bills relative to meat should not be passed.

I dislike to keep reading these, but they are interesting.

Here is another one from the same place, of the same date:

Kendrick and Kenyon bills relative to meat should not be passed.

Mr. THOMAS. That sounds like an anthem.

Mr. KENYON. One feels like singing it. Here is another one, the same thing, July 14, Clifton Forge. Let me read one in full:

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
Chairman Agricultural Committee, Washington, D. C.:
Kendrick and Kenyon bills relative to meat should not be passed.
SELMA MYER CO.

CLIFTON FORGE, VA.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
Chairman Agricultural Committee.
Kendrick and Kenyon bills relative to meat should not be passed.

This thing is pretty nearly unanimous down at Clifton Forge. Again:

CLIFTON FORGE, VA., July 14.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA:
Kendrick and Kenyon bills relative to meat should not be passed.

We will pass from Clifton Forge to something else. Here is one from Pekin, Ill., dated July 18:

I protest against Senate bill 2202—

These representatives tell them to write and refer to the bill as 2202—

as unfair to the packers and their customers. It is too autocratic and un-American in character for any American soldier to approve. Wish you would use your influence to stop this bill.
JOHN ZIMMERMAN.

Here is one from Trinity Cotton Oil Co., of Texas. They are vitally interested, they say, as they are the largest consumers of our production of the cottonseed oil.

Here is an attorney from Stamford. I do not know whether he is a member of the Kiwanis Club or the yacht club:

I have read provisions of the Kenyon bill which seem to be vicious and disastrous to business. Hope it will not pass.

He signs it as "attorney," same as the judge.

SPRINGFIELD.

We oppose the Kenyon bill. Believe it is un-American.

This is from Illinois. It will please the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN].

Believe it is un-American and will harm larger concerns who have helped all retail concerns in profiteering.

I think that must be a mistake, but I will have to let it go as it is. Far be it from me to accuse the packers of any profiteering.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN., July 18.

At a meeting of retail butchers and grocers, of which I am a member, a meeting was held and all decided that the Kendrick bill ought to be killed.

Another one from Bridgeport:

Kendrick bill would be against best interests of public. Packers are giving us food cheaper than could get it any other way. I protest against its passage.

This gentleman labors under the belief that he is getting his food cheaper; that by virtue of the packers it is cheaper than it would be otherwise. Of course, if that is true probably nothing ought to be done.

Another gentleman, from Rochester, N. Y.:

Defeat Kenyon-Kendrick bill, which is now before the United States Senate. Government control of packing industry would be an impossibility.

Another from Bridgeport, Conn.:

Butchers and grocers held meeting in Bridgeport and talked over bill introduced by Mr. KENDRICK and decided that this bill would be against our interest, and I hope the bill will be killed.

Here is another one from Bridgeport:

I am opposed to Kendrick bill. Kill it.

H. COHEN.

Here is another one from Bridgeport:

I am opposed to Kendrick bill. It is ridiculous. Kill it.

There is a sanguinary lot of people living around Bridgeport apparently.

Here is a more reasonable gentleman:

I protest against Kendrick bill. If passed, it would be against best interests of my business. Hope to see it has fair consideration and finally killed.

Like the justice of the peace who took the case under advisement, with the statement that he would decide for the plaintiff in three days. [Laughter.]

MOUNT VERNON, N. Y.

We, the members of Mount Vernon Business Men's Association, Mount Vernon, at a meeting held Thursday, July 17, adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That we regard the Kenyon bill as un-American and wish to register our formal protest against passage of same.

"MOUNT VERNON BUSINESS MEN'S ASSOCIATION."

Does anybody on the face of the earth even believe that the Mount Vernon Business Men's Association ever considered this bill or knew anything that is in it except as may have been told them by some representative of the packers?

It may be well that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] is in the far West, where he is perfectly safe, because from the tenor of some of these telegrams it would seem as if the Senator from Wyoming and the Senator from Iowa, even for introducing bills and asking any consideration of them, ought to be taken out and shot at sunrise.

Here is a gentleman from Virginia who telegraphs:

Down with the Kenyon bill.

Another one from Albany, Oreg., July 15:

As a man interested in welfare of country, I beg you to use your influence to defeat Kenyon bill.

Here is another one wired from Moscow, Idaho, protesting and saying it would—

Disrupt not only meat business, but the entire business structure of this country.

Here is a gentleman from Washington, an interesting one:

Senator ASLE J. GRONNA,
Chairman Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Opposed to Kenyon bill licensing packers. Should receive no consideration.

A. ABRAHAM.

If I had received that telegram before introducing the bill, I should have been constrained not to do it.

Here are others from Bremerton, Wash. Here is a very interesting dispatch from Florida:

Opposed to Kenyon bill. High cost of living reduced by competition. No reason to cut it off.

A man who can understand that the high cost of living has been reduced ought to have his head X-rayed, so that the picture may be given to the rest of the Nation to understand how a man can think that way. So this gentleman does not want anything done about these bills, because the high cost of living has been reduced by competition between the packers.

Here is another man from West Virginia, who wires:

Kenyon and Kendrick bill relative packers should be stopped. Kill them, stop them, end them in some way.

Here is another from Florida, who wires:

If this Kenyon bill passes, I can see my finish as a butcher.

NATHAN ABRAHAMSON.

[Laughter.]

Here is another one from Seattle:

I am opposed to Kenyon bill regulating packing industry of this country. Contrary to rights of free thinking people.

Here is a postmaster down in Cape Charles, Va. I wonder how he got into this thing. He wires the chairman:

I oppose Kenyon bill, Senate 2202, very much.

W. B. BULL, Postmaster.

Mr. President, here is a bunch of one-half the telegrams that a certain Senator has received. They run along in this same way. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to go over them. I think I have connected up pretty well these telegrams and the telegrams the Senators have been receiving with circulars that have gone out from the packers.

Now, what about the letters? You have received stacks upon stacks of letters. I have some of them here that I have authority to use as showing the similarity, but I think I will not take the time to go over them. But here are a number that I want to refer to. Here is a large number of letters from Nashville, Tenn. In many instances they are written on a typewriter evidently by people who were not the signers of the letters. Others were even written in longhand and then signed by a person whose signature is entirely different from the body of the letter. There are others that are exactly alike and the wording exactly alike, signed, some of them, by people down at the bottom of the page, evidently not the person constructing the letter, and others in different places on the page. The typewriting, the paper, the words are all alike. Here is a very large assortment from Nashville. Here is another assortment almost identical from Rahway, N. J., paper alike, typewriting alike, evidently all prepared, and then signed by people sometimes down at the bottom of the page. These are interesting to look at if anybody cares to do it. I am not going to spend time upon them.

From Denver, Colo., there are a large number exactly alike, sent in on July 14, just at the proper time to hear from those circulars. Then I have some without any towns on at all. Here is a large number from Cedar Rapids, in my State, practically alike, prepared evidently by some one with the same sized paper for each one, the same typewriter, and signed by various people of Cedar Rapids, where, by the way, they have a packing house controlled by one of the large packers.

Here are different places through New Jersey, showing how the campaign is on; through Massachusetts; through Kentucky, a large number from Ansonia, Ky., all alike; others from Derby, Conn., same typewriting, same paper, almost the same language, signed up by people whom they have called upon and asked to do it; some from Vermont, Arkansas, and Massachusetts. Here are some from North Adams, Mass. They seem to have had a very prosperous day at North Adams. Some from New Bedford, Mass.; Westfield, Mass.; Chrome, N. J.; some from Denver, Colo.; Muskogee, Okla.; Adams, Mass. I am not going to weary you with these things, but I want to refer now to some things that have come in showing how the job has been done that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] asked me about.

I do not know whether I ought to use this man's name. Here is the statement by a certain employee:

Mr. Lee Armour, manager, told me that if Government took over packing industry there would be no more deliveries.

Statement by another Armour employee at Stamford, Conn.:

I was told if the Government took over packing houses they would centralize plants and a lot of us would lose our jobs.

Statement by another one:

I was told that if Government supervises packers they would also take over retailers who did business of a certain amount, and we would have a Government employee in our establishment; also that everything would have to be paid for in cash, as there would be no more credit.

Here is a gentleman who writes to me as to their procedure at Hartford, Conn.:

Senator KENYON, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: A special representative of Swift & Co. called here on me at my store to-day. In one hand was a copy of the Kenyon bill and in the other a petition for me to sign. Here follows the conversation:

Swift's man: "Here is a law that Congress proposes to enact, and if it passes you are driven out of business, for the prices of all packing-house products will immediately rise to such a point that none but the very wealthy will be able to buy these products, and you have not got any of this class of trade. The packers are your friends, and we want you to sign this petition as a protest against this bill. We will see that you lose nothing by doing it."

Here is this merchant's answer:

I have been handling packing-house products since 1904, having retailed last year $212,000 worth of them. Up to January 1 last I was just $1,800 richer than in 1904. There is absolutely no escape for me, being compelled to buy every slaughtered animal, together with every piece, part, or trimming thereof that enters into my store from Swift & Co., Armour & Co., Cudahy & Co., Morris & Co., and Wilson & Co., they being all one and the same, with the result that I am obliged to pay any price they see fit to ask, and these prices are always identically the same. For years I have been obliged to daily rob every customer that buys bacon, ham, pork loins, etc., by making them pay from 38 cents to 50 cents per pound for extra heavy paper, burlap, string, etc., which these packers willfully place so abundantly around about these goods, as I am obliged to pay you for all of this stuff. I am obliged to sell you back at whatever price you see fit to pay, all my bones, tallow, scrap, etc., as you positively own the only rendering collecting agency in this city for these goods. Not satisfied with what you have, you have been and still are carrying on a systematic, fiendish, and devilish crusade against every wholesale distributor of butter, cheese, eggs, and poultry, maliciously underselling these legitimate distributors in your decision to swiftly eliminate them and gain the same control over production and outletting as you now have on packing-house products, and if you lose a few million dollars in killing off these people a twist of 2 or 3 cents a pound on packing-house products for a few days will more than make up.

You have the farmers that produce live stock all over the world now by the throat, and you are now after the product of this live stock while it is alive, namely, milk. You have near control over milk condenseries, and as soon as you control the cheese and butter business you will be in control of the entire milk production. Further, if I do not buy these lines from you I am virtually put out of the beef and allied lines. You now come to me with nearly a demand to eliminate all my wholesale grocery friends of years standing and buy from you canned goods of every description, coffee, cereals, produce, and, in fact, nearly everything sold in a grocery store. Just take your petition and yourself out of my presence, for you are a perfect bane to my existence.

I leave out a personal reference. Then he continues:

If this monopoly, unspeakable and unparalleled in the history of the world, is not squelched absolute riotous anarchy will result.

That language is probably too strong. I do not mean to indorse any such language, but it shows how people can be worked up by the possibility of the destruction of their business.

Every fool that runs knows well that these five corporations have the packing-house business in all its ramifications tied up beyond description, and as a result of this monopoly the enormous profits which they are making permits them to slaughter every human being, firm, or corporation engaged in any other line of business that they see fit and set out to devour, and they are engaged in this operation from dawn to dawn every day.

Being a retailer and at the mercy of these wolves, I regret that I can not make known my name to you, for if I did, and they knew I wrote this letter, I am doomed.

I have a letter from the director of the Southern Wholesale Grocers' Association. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] in his usual positive way stated that this is a fight between the packers and the wholesale grocers. It is not, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. SMOOT. The propaganda is.

Mr. KENYON. Where is the wholesale-grocery propaganda? Will the Senator from Utah produce a single letter sent out by the Southern Wholesale Grocers' Association or any other asking for support of this bill?

Mr. SMOOT. I am not here to defend the packers, nor am I here to criticize the National Wholesale Grocers' Association.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator was very quick to say that it is a fight between the wholesale grocers and the packers.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator put in the RECORD only yesterday——

Mr. KENYON. Against the propaganda of the packers.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; and that is what the Senator from Utah stated.

Mr. KENYON. All right. I have not any doubt the wholesale grocers are going to get behind the legislation to control the packers. I hope they will. I hope we will have their help, as well as the help of the ordinary folks around the country. We will get a few of those, but if the Senator believes that they have anything to do with the introduction of these bills, he is entirely mistaken.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah does not believe any such thing. The Senator does not believe they had anything to do with the propaganda of the packers. That propaganda started with the packers just the same as propaganda by the farmers started for the repeal of the daylight-saving law. There is no difference at all. What the Senator from Utah complains of is that with reference to every piece of legislation which comes to Congress there is a propaganda started either for it or against it. The Senator from Iowa knows that.

Mr. KENYON. I am inclined to agree with the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. What I objected to was filling the RECORD with that sort of stuff, for I call it "stuff." What effect do all the telegrams and letters to which the Senator has been referring have upon the Senate? These letters and telegrams came to the chairman of the committee and I have not any doubt at all if I had received them I would have paid no more attention to them than I would to that much trash. That is the position of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator think when he gets dispatches from his State from reputable men, they are trash?

Mr. SMOOT. When a number of telegrams come to me in exactly the same words from people in my State who I know are not interested in the business, then I pay no attention to them whatever, I will say frankly to the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. I think that is perfectly true of the Senator. I hope they do not have any effect.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that whenever a petition comes to me and I know the parties from my State from whom it comes and I know they know what they are talking about, and know they are interested in the legislation as affecting the country rather than an individual or a business, I am interested in it, but otherwise I pay no attention to it.

Mr. KENYON. Of course, it is getting so Senators can not answer their mail. Every question that comes up, along comes some tremendous propaganda.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that so far as the Senator from Utah is concerned, I do answer them, but I have a form of a letter and I run it off in just the same number as the letters that I receive, as well as the number of petitions.

Mr. KENYON. We are straight on that now.

This letter from Mr. Heney, director of the Southern Wholesale Grocers' Association, submits evidence showing the method being used by the meat packers to secure names for petitions and telegrams. He sends copies of the telegrams such as already referred to when the Senator from Colorado asked me the question. He sends copies of telegrams to the different retail dealers to send in to the Senate and to the House. Here is a form address, all prepared, for Hon. LEE OVERMAN, United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

Am opposed to Kenyon bill.

This goes ahead, "Charge account message to dated, number of words," and so forth. He writes that these telegrams were furnished and paid for by the packers.

Mr. SMOOT. In this connection, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. With reference to the number of letters the Senator has referred to to-day and the telegrams, I have not any doubt but what most of them have been paid for by the packers. I called attention only day before yesterday, I think it was, to a propaganda that was started here by one of the departments. The Joint Committee on Printing held hearings a week ago last Monday in relation to continuing or discontinuing certain governmental publications. Immediately a propaganda was started, before any action was taken by the committee.

I think I have received as many telegrams and as many letters upon the question of the Reclamation Record as the Senator from Iowa has presented here to the Senate to-day, and that propaganda came from the department. What I object to is that kind of propaganda, and I would like the country to understand that that kind of propaganda or the propaganda that is referred to by the Senator to-day cuts no figure, and it might as well be considered to be a waste of money.

Mr. KENYON. I am glad of that, and I think it will be a good thing to get that idea before the country. I hope the Senator will in his forceful way blow up that propaganda, as I am trying to do this one.

The Reynolds-Davis Grocery Co. wired me from Fort Smith, Ark., from whence I produce a number of telegrams:

FORT SMITH, ARK., July 17, 1919.

Hon. WILLIAM S. KENYON,
Washington, D. C.:

The packers have their salesmen working this week on retail merchants, trying to get them to wire and write their Congressmen and Senators to oppose your bill. They are telling merchants your bill is against public good, and using every other argument they can to try and defeat it.

REYNOLDS-DAVIS GROCERY CO.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., July 17, 1919.

Senator WILLIAM S. KENYON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Present packers' campaign of misrepresentation and insidious influence to induce flood of letters and wires to Congress against Kenyon bill should be exposed by you.

LEWIS H. HANEY.

HUNTSVILLE, ALA., July 19, 1919.

Senator KENYON,
Washington, D. C.:

Investigation shows the protests against Kenyon bill coming from merchants in this vicinity were solicited and written by representatives of the packers, senders not being required to pay for messages. It also appears some of the senders do not know what they are protesting against.

That is certainly true. This telegram is signed by W. L. Halsey Grocery Co., Huntsville Grocery Co., Alabama Grocery Co., Gudenrath & Hall, Lyle & Lyle.

Here is a letter from Connecticut, which is as follows:

NEW HAVEN, CONN., July 16, 1919.

GENTLEMEN: I am inclosing you what the Big Four packers are requesting the retail grocer to sign and using all kinds of arguments to induce said retailer to sign in opposition to the Kenyon-Kendrick bill (S. 2202).

One of our salesmen was handed the inclosed by a customer and asked what he should do with it. Our salesman told him to say, "No; I am not opposed to the bill." Continuing the conversation, he said: "I guess I won't do anything about it. The packers are bigger than the Congress of the United States and will get what they want."

This is the general feeling in our section. New Haven is a city of 175,000, and has in it more than 800 retail grocers struggling to get a living. Forty-five per cent of them could not live if it were not for the wholesale grocer.

It does seem to us that the packers are going beyond their limit in trying to control all food products, and their methods in the past do not show that any benefit has resulted to the general public or to anyone except the packers themselves.

They ask the question, "Are you familiar with the proposed legislation, which would restrict competition in the wholesale grocery business and prevent concerns such as the Chicago packers from selling grocery products?" and trying to show by this that the wholesale grocery does not want competition. I have been in the wholesale grocery business more than 40 years, and I have never seen competition so strong among the wholesale grocers as it is to-day—that is, among themselves.

It is a grave question: Should the meat packers of the country absorb and control the distribution of food products?

That is the question presented by the bill I have introduced. I have other letters showing how this propaganda has been carried on throughout the country. I think I shall not take the time, however, to refer to them. This contest is not going to be all one sided. I am glad these gentlemen have stirred the thing up, because the people of the country are going to begin to see what this measure is, just how it is going to affect the packers, and just what the packers are doing. They are going to begin to study the report of the Federal Trade Commission—I hope we may have extra copies of it printed—and also the letter of the Federal Trade Commission to the President. The people are realizing, even if Congress is not, that the packers are reaching out into all of these lines of industry. I have referred to these letters merely to show the sources from which these telegrams came.

I will discuss the bill at some later time. There will undoubtedly be many amendments to the bill in committee; it may never be reported out; entirely new bills may be reported out. There will be absolutely no hurry; it is too important a question to the packers, to business, and to the people of this country to have any ill-considered legislation; but the activities of these gentlemen now are extending into fertilizer, eggs, cheese, butter, rice, breakfast foods, canned vegetables, soda-fountain supplies, and many other lines. Some of them are the owners of grain-elevator companies. Some are in the American International Corporation, with its shipping interests, and some of their subsidiaries grow tropical fruits in Hawaii; others are reaching into the salmon fisheries of Alaska; others are canning shrimps taken from the waters of the Gulf of Mexico. They have gotten into the wool business and the rice business. Perhaps it may go on, and anyone who says a word about this or tries to do anything in an humble way to stop it is playing politics and is a general all-around nuisance. Perhaps that is so; perhaps the people of this country do not care if monopolization is established in everything that they have to eat; perhaps they do not; but I have an idea that they do; that they are going to be heard from; and that the propaganda, if it may so be called, will not be all upon one side.

The city council of Quincy, Ill., passed some very interesting resolutions on last Monday evening, July 14, which were proposed by Alderman Hyatt. They are very short; I do not indorse the language of the resolutions; but I do not think they will shock anybody very much. They show, however, that some of the everyday folk are waking up to the situation and that the packers' propaganda has aroused others. I ask that the resolutions be read at the desk, Mr. President, if there is no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Whereas Congress, Senate and House, have year after year, from time to time, sent out committees to investigate the octopus, commonly called the "Packing Trust"; and

Whereas year after year these committees have returned reports adverse to the combine, then went to sleep or camouflaged the issue by allowing these big packers to combine and control the markets in which they buy, as well as control the markets in which they sell, and rob the masses; and

Whereas a majority of the House and Senate have kept one eye shut, ever and always helping this band of insane money grabbers to throttle competition and substitute one of the most gigantic monopolies ever instituted by men; and

Whereas Senator WILLIAM S. KENYON, of Iowa, has a bill now before the Senate in favor of controlling this damnable trust, forcing them to lower the price of food to the masses, take the Government out of their greedy clutches, and follow the Constitution of the United States instead of the stolen constitution they have been following for years, with the motto, "The public be damned": Therefore be it

Resolved, That this body, selected to safeguard and fight the battles of 40,000 constituents, instruct the city clerk to forward to Senator KENYON a copy of this resolution with the thanks of the Quincy city council for his efforts to put these two-legged profit hogs under license and regulate them and compel them to work under the time-honored principle of supply and demand in order to save this grand Government from revolution; be it further

Resolved, That our Representatives and Senators vote for the people in their districts instead of for the packing trust, that, if not checked, will become a menace to liberty and civilization, and in this resolution we warn our congressional representatives that this council's hand will show in this district, and that therefore we advise that Senator KENYON'S bill be adopted as drafted and that it must not be cut to pieces by cunningly worded amendments and loaded down with technicalities.

Mr. KENYON. I think, perhaps, I ought not to have had those resolutions read in the Senate. The language is too strong. I do not indorse that language at all, and I am rather surprised that the city council of Quincy should have adopted such strong language.

Mr. THOMAS. It sounds a little like some of the arguments on the league of nations.

Mr. KENYON. Well, I think we never get anywhere by abusive language.

Here is a dispatch I have received from Butte, Mont., which reads:

BUTTE, MONT., July 22, 1919.

Senator KENYON,
The Capitol, Washington, D. C.:

Butte Central Labor Council, Butte, representing about 12,000 members, indorses Senate bill 2202 and has instructed affiliated locals to take similar action.

JOHN GREEN, Secretary.

So this fight is not going to be an absolutely one-sided affair.

Mr. President, I have said about all I am going to say, and I did not really want to say anything, but felt it my duty to show how this propaganda is being carried on. I think that Senators and the great business interests ought to read an article in the Journal of Commerce of July 14. The Journal of Commerce of New York certainly can not be accused of being a Bolshevik organ or an exceedingly radical organ. I understand it is an ultraconservative organ and has often been accused of being a spokesman of the great interests. I want to read briefly from it. The language is worthy of thought. The article is headed "Offense of the packers" and reads:

Such response as the "Big Five," who are trying to monopolize the food trade of the country, make to the charges of the Federal Trade Commission consists mainly of a claim that what they have done and are doing is for the benefit of the country and its people. That is the familiar claim of all autocratic power, however it may be constituted and whatever its purpose. The preliminary report of the commission to the President covers a wide field and deals with a variety of activities, besides the slaughter of cattle and sheep and the control of markets and of foreign trade in beef and mutton. That is a familiar story. There is a claim that they are not combined and have no agreement as to quantities dealt in or prices charged, and consequently commit no violation of the antimonopoly policy of the Government. It is a well-known and undeniable fact that there was a combination and a close cooperation in building up the vast control that has been established. While that has been nominally abandoned, and there is no formal agreement such as the law forbids, there is in fact a mutual understanding and cooperation on a common basis that makes the maintenance of effective competition impossible.

One of the chief claims is that this vast combination is the effect of adjusting the food supply to the demand in a way to make the cost economical and the price moderate, with only a small percentage of profit for the huge corporations, and figures are given out to convince of this. But the expanded capital has been largely worked out of past profits turned into forms of investment in the business, and whether prices are higher or lower than they would otherwise be can not be calculated from the figures presented. The huge control through the several centers for collecting material and distributing products determines the price of the animals at the yards and of the meat and other products in the markets. This powerful control extends in no small measure to those who raise the sheep and cattle and, to a less extent, the hogs and leaves them no freedom in the markets. It extends also to the agencies for distributing the products of slaughterhouses to the markets for food not only by wholesale but by retail through cities and towns. It does not apply to meat alone, for skins, horns, hoofs, and bones have been utilized and made profitable. This is claimed as a merit and a benefit to the public; and so it is in effect, but it is not necessary to constitute and maintain a monopoly to attain such results. When that is done it greatly enriches the few and hampers the competitive efforts of the many.

But this monopolizing and profiting process on a great scale has by no means been confined to stock farms, butcher shops, and meat markets. It has been extended to many other articles of food, dairy products, grain, and fruit, and even to building material in no small measure, because in collecting, transporting, and distributing on such an immense scale all these things can be worked in with the rest at reduced cost and with increased profit, crowding out or restricting competition on any effective scale. The advantage of this has come largely from means of storage, transportation, and distribution from central market places the country over. The companies have built up and maintained extensive packing places and adapted them to a variety of storage purposes, reducing the cost per unit and monopolizing their use. This has been carried on on no small scale into railroad transportation and delivery. The National Wholesale Grocers' Association submitted a complaint to the Interstate Commerce Commission only a short time ago of discrimination granted to these packing combinations by railroads in the cost of carrying their commodities. The packers, not only of meat but of many other things, have yards of their own with cars and tracks and means of loading and unloading and cars for transportation to distant markets for their own exclusive use. They also have special contracts with railroad companies, according to this charge of the grocers, which discriminates on a generous scale in their favor and to their advantage and profit in distributing commodities.

It is easy to claim for this kind of monopolizing a public benefit and a diminution in the cost of living. This might be the case if it were carried on in an ideal and unselfish manner for the common welfare. That is, it might be made a benefit in a pecuniary sense, assuming that it was conducted with such high motives; but even then it would be the opposite of the benefit in its effect upon public and personal interests and rights. It would deaden competition and rivalry in all the productive activities and restrain ambition for success in life. This would be a degenerating and corrupting evil, to the ruin of national character and of real enterprise, lowering the morale of the whole Nation. Anything more inconsistent with the principle and spirit of genuine Americanism is hardly conceivable, and it is of the utmost consequence that it be stopped, and that the ways be open and free for the energies of American life in a normal state of health and activity.

If all the claims of the packers were conceded, the fact would remain that they still control the meat supply of the United States; that they dominate numerous related industries; and that they are extending their activities in so many other directions as to openly threaten the natural freedom of trade.

No matter how plausible the answers of the packers may seem, they have acquired a power over highly important lines of industry which, if not curbed, will assuredly lead to a fresh outbreak of monopoly, with all its attendant social and economic dangers. Such power, however carefully exercised when under suspicion, is sure to be abused at the first opportunity, for history proves that few man can resist the temptations of unrestrained power, and, rightly or wrongly, the man in the street will grow jealous of this power over his food supply, affording the wily politician a fruitful opportunity to flay the wicked packer.

Judging by their recent propaganda—

Remember, this is from a friendly organ—

the packers must have already read the handwriting on the wall, and presumably they recognize that if their present monopolistic tendencies continue they must prepare to accept one of two alternatives, either Government regulation or Government ownership. Surely they do not intend to precipitate the latter by defiance of public opinion; and it is hardly to be supposed they will seriously oppose the former. If the people should have to choose—between exploitation by the food barons or socialization by the Government, it is easy to see where their choice will fall. That some curb upon the overgrasping monopolistic tendencies of the packers will be applied is practically certain.

And it would be well to remember this—

The bill concerning which there has been so much talk is not a Government-ownership bill. I am not in favor of and would not introduce a bill for Government ownership of the packing industry. It is merely a bill seeking to regulate the packers—stringent, yes; radical, yes; but the things we now think are radical in five years we may not think are radical through a licensing system, concerning which there may be very valid objection; but it seems to be the only method in sight now; through a divorcement of the stockyards from the ownership of the packers, a divorcement of private cars from their control, and the power to keep them out of unrelated businesses. I grant that presents a radical field, far-reaching in its consequences, one which ought to have the most serious consideration of the committee and Congress, and it will have. Public opinion ought not to be swayed by manufactured propaganda on either side.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I apprehend that very likely some Senators will desire to respond to the address of the Senator from Iowa or, perhaps, to discuss further the subject he has presented to the Senate, but I am going to appeal to Senators who may feel so disposed to defer until some other time anything they may care to present upon that subject, which is not before the Senate in the bill under consideration. The bill under consideration is the Agricultural appropriation bill. It carries the usual appropriations for the Forestry Service. My State is burning up; there are furious fires raging in practically all of the national forests in the State; the Forestry Service has a force of 2,500 men in the field to-day, without a dollar to pay them, the appropriation, of course, having expired on the 30th day of last June. They are really conducting the work at this time practically in defiance of law, for, as I have said, they have not a dollar to pay the men who are employed. I trust, therefore, that we may look to Senators to defer further discussion of this particular subject.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I had expected to follow up what has been said by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] with a short discussion as to the extent of the business controlled by the packers in this country as well as in Argentina and Great Britain, but, out of deference to the request made by the Senator from Montana, and he is well justified in making the request, I shall defer what I desire to say on the subject until a more opportune time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I thank the Senator very much indeed.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7413) making appropriations for the department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment reported by the committee.

The SECRETARY. On page 102, after line 3, it is proposed to insert:

That any homestead settler or entryman who, during the calendar year 1919, finds it necessary to leave his homestead to seek employment in order to obtain food and other necessaries of life for himself, family, and work stock, because of great and serious drought conditions, causing total or partial failures of crops, may, upon filing with the register and receiver proof of such conditions in the form of a corroborated affidavit, be excused from residence upon his homestead during all or part of the calendar year 1919, or the current year of such homestead which may fall principally in the year 1919, and in the making of final proof upon such an entry absence granted under this act shall be counted and construed as constructive residence by said homesteader.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I wish to join the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] in requesting Senators to allow this bill to pass. The Agricultural Department is without funds, although not only in the State of Montana but in other sections in the western portion of the country fires are raging and timber is burning up. This bill is exactly in the form as passed by the House, with the exception of the amendment just read at the desk. The daylight-saving provision has been eliminated. The amendment reported by the committee simply provides that entrymen who have taken homesteads may be permitted to leave their homesteads during the year 1919 to enable them to go to work and in that way make a living. I do not think any Senator or any Member of the House of Representatives can possibly have any objection to that amendment. It does not carry a single cent of appropriation. The labor is needed. In my State, in the State of Minnesota, and in all of the grain States we will be glad to get this labor, and certainly the entrymen ought to be permitted to leave their homesteads and go out and make a living for themselves and their families.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, do I understand that this bill is the same, with the exception of the elimination of the daylight-saving provision and the amendment of which the Senator now speaks, as the bill passed by the Senate at this session and vetoed by the President?

Mr. GRONNA. Exactly; and it is in the same form as it was passed by the House, with the exception of the amendment referred to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, a bill embodying the amendment reported by the committee is before the Public Lands Committee of the Senate in exactly the words of the provision found in this bill. It is true that a point of order could be made against the amendment, but I sincerely hope that no Senator will make such a point. All that has been said in relation to the necessity of the amendment is proper and right, and I will add that so far as the Public Lands Committee of the Senate is concerned they have already authorized a favorable report upon the measure which has been referred to them, and if in conference the Senate committee amendment is not agreed to by the House, a report from the Public Lands Committee on the measure referred to will be made at once, with a request for unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill, so that we may secure the legislation in that way.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I am very glad that this amendment has the hearty approval of the chairman of the committee, and I am glad to hear him give the reasons for it. He has done so in a very clear and concise manner. The amendment is designed to meet the most terrible calamity that has ever visited the Northwestern States, and I hope it will be adopted without objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on page 101, beginning with line 20, I move to strike out down to and including the word "sale," on page 102. The provision which I move to strike out reads as follows:

That the word "package," where it occurs the second and last time in the act entitled "An act to amend section 8 of an act entitled 'An act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes,'" approved March 3, 1913, shall include and shall be construed to include wrapped meats inclosed in papers or other materials as prepared by the manufacturers thereof for sale.

I wish to take a few moments to state the reasons why I move the amendment. I take it for granted that no Senator wishes by the adoption of this provision to impose upon the consumer an expense beyond question of between $5,000,000 and $6,000,000 and perhaps of from $10,000,000 to $20,000,000 or even more than that. I wish to say now that, in my mind, without a question, if the provision becomes a law, the consuming public, paying the extremely high prices they are already paying for bacon and for ham, will be assessed many, many million dollars more. The adoption of this provision for branding the weight on every ham and package of bacon will result in an added cost of nearly 4 cents per ham or package of bacon. There are on the average about 150,000,000 hams packed each year. An average added expense of 4 cents each would involve an amount of between five and six million dollars, which will necessarily be incurred without the consumer receiving one penny of benefit.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to explain in detail the reason for my position. There are no two hams that weigh exactly the same. It is held by every court, as well as by the Agricultural Department, that the wrapping of hams and bacon in paper, or whatever the container may be, is for the purpose of keeping them clean and for the preservation of the weight of the package, and therefore that practice is not held within the purview of the pure-food law.

If Congress wishes to take this action and impose this added burden upon the consuming public, well and good. I wish it distinctly understood that I am not here speaking for the packers; I am speaking for the consumers of meat who already have to pay such enormous prices for hams and bacon.

It is not only the cost of 4 cents a ham that will be added, but if there is marked upon a ham its weight at the time it is cured and covered, say 12 pounds, all the courts and the Agricultural Department recognize the fact that this implies that the weight shall remain the same, although the ham may shrink from 4 ounces to 16 ounces. If that ham is marked upon the cover as weighing 12 pounds, and the retailer buys it from the packer or the wholesaler, he buys it at the actual weight; but when he comes to sell it, if it is branded as a 12-pound ham, he is going to sell it, more than likely, as a 12-pound ham, whether it weighs 11 pounds 4 ounces, 11 pounds 8 ounces, or only 11 pounds, and the consumer will have to pay for the 12 pounds. As it is now, if the packer puts up hams, and they remain in his possession two weeks, or one month, or two months, whatever shrinkage may occur the packer loses, because he sells them to the wholesaler at actual weight. If the wholesaler holds the ham a month, and it shrinks 4 ounces or 8 ounces, the retailer pays for the ham at its weight at the time he buys it from the wholesaler; and to-day when the retailer sells it he sells it at whatever the weight is when the ham is sold, and the retailer has to absorb whatever the shrinkage is.

So far as the wrappers are concerned, the cost of wrapping the ham and the preparation of it for market are taken into account to-day, as everybody knows. If the Congress wishes to impose the additional labor of marking the weight upon the ham at the time it is put up, well and good; but I wish the Senate to know that it will mean additional millions of dollars to the consumers of these articles.

The Senator from North Dakota tells me that he desires the passage of this bill to-night. I do not wish to say anything more about the subject at this time. I have given a plain statement of facts; and I predict now, Mr. President, if this provision becomes a law, the consuming public will pay millions of dollars which otherwise they would not pay. On that statement, I simply ask for a vote upon the amendment before the bill passes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I very much wish to accommodate the Senator from North Dakota in regard to having a vote taken upon the bill to-night, and that can be done, as far as I am concerned.

The Senator from Utah has called attention to the fact that this provision will not decrease the cost of living, but on the contrary it will increase it by somewhere from five to seven million dollars. That is literally true. With 150,000,000 pieces of side bacon and hams, which constitute the total output of the packing industry, large and small, in the country, this will require the separate weighing and handling of that 150,000,000 packages. The last business year there were that many pieces handled by the entire packing industry in the United States. Not only will this additional cost be put upon the consumer but it will furnish to the retail people a very convenient process for exacting from the purchaser, the ultimate consumer, an additional charge.

Let me give an illustration.

There are certain proprietary medicines or compounds that are in common use—antiseptics, deodorizers, milk of magnesia, and so forth. Magnesia in the common form in which it was used in the household years ago used to be in the form of a brick, or a solid mass, or something similar to cream cheese. Of late years it has been reduced to a milk of magnesia, and sold, one very well-known brand which is the common specific for superacidity, at 50 cents a bottle. When there was a revenue charge imposed in the internal-revenue act, in order to raise more money, of 2 cents on the 50-cent bottle, we would naturally suppose that it would be sold at 52 cents; but the very thrifty druggists in most parts of the country, or in many parts of the country, immediately not only added the 2 cents but they added an additional nickel for pasting on the revenue stamp. It took that much additional help. So the bottle, immediately following that, cost 57 cents instead of 50 cents.

In this particular instance, the average small ham weighs something like 12 pounds. It is now wrapped in paper or cloth, unweighed, and goes from the packer into the hands of the meat-market man or the grocer. The grocer sells it to the consumer in an entire ham by actual weight. It is put upon the scales and weighed, and I pay him by the pound so much for smoked ham, so much for salted side meat or bacon. In every instance I pay by the pound by actual weight in the grocery shop. I do not pay for a pound more than I receive in the actual consumable commodity. Now, the whole 150,000,000 pieces not only will go through the process mentioned by the Senator from Utah but it will go to the retail dealer, the grocer, or the meat-market man with the weight stamped upon it. It will be a 12-pound piece of smoked ham, to illustrate. Smoked ham, from the time it leaves the hands of the packer, through the various stages of commercial activity until it reaches the kitchen, is subject to diminution in weight exceeding any known commodity of ordinary use in the kitchen, with the exception of sugar. Sugar has a very large moisture content, and it is subject to a most remarkable shrinkage, and that must be covered in the retail trade. Ham and bacon shrink very appreciably. Ham will shrink more than salted bacon. That is shrunk in the salting process, so that it is not so noticeable. But a 12-pound ham, to illustrate, is weighed, and stamped by the packer "12 pounds." It passes through the various hands, until when I buy it at retail it is marked "12 pounds." Now, whatever the retail grocer may pay for it, whether on a 12-pound basis or on the basis of its shrinkage, paying for it by actual pounds, I do not know what he will do, but I know the excuse that is made. It will be marked "12 pounds in weight," and the grocer will sell it to me for 12 pounds. It will be like other package commodities. Every package commodity is sold at the marked contents, branded on the outside of the package. Whether there is that much in it or not, nobody knows. A package of rice never contains the amount that is branded on the outside of the package. Not a single cereal package of any kind contains the amount that is supposed to be in it, or the amount that is branded on the outside, the quantity that is so branded, either in weight or measure, whatever it may be.

This gives to the retail dealer an excuse and a very plausible pretext for selling to me a 12-pound ham after the shrinkage is taken out. The shrinkage is gone. It is not a weight. I pay for it, and never get it. I pay on a 12-pound basis and get 11 pounds, or 10 pounds and a half. At least, I get short my 16 ounces to the pound, because it is estimated by actual observation that an average 12-pound ham will shrink from 10 to 14 ounces in passing from the packing house until it reaches the grocer, and by the time it reaches my kitchen it will have shrunk at least that much.

Now, I very much question whether the dealer sells his ham, branded on the outside "12 pounds" under Government inspection and by such an amendment as this, for what it actually contains. I will pay for it on the 12-pound basis, but I will doubt very much whether I will get the 12 pounds. I will get the 12 pounds less the shrinkage, but I will pay for it on the 12-pound basis. That happens every time these changes are made.

I could go further, but I do not wish to take the time of the Senate, because I think this bill ought to be passed to-night, for the reasons stated by the chairman of the committee. In every one of these cases—and I have followed them up for the last five years in groceries, in drug stores, in notion stores, in dry goods, in clothing, in everything that is sold by the piece or brand or trade-mark, whatever it may be—if it is sold by measure or weight, in every instance these changes are made the pretext for piling on the consumer additional retail charges. I have watched the steps by which, gradually, these small items have been added; and it is the most surprising thing in the retail trade to take some article of package food—prepared food, manufactured—and watch the gradual process of adding charges; or to take some well-established proprietary compound like I mentioned and watch its gradual increase from the old price before the war, adding on with each revenue charge an additional charge by the retail dealer, so that not only is the internal-revenue charge covered but an additional charge made the excuse for taking from the consumer an added 5 cents on the package or bottle. This is another excuse; and I have no doubt whatever that it will inure finally to the burden of the ultimate consumer who comes to buy the meat.

I will not engage in discussing the matters discussed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON]. At the proper time, Mr. President, I wish to go into those matters. Some of the large packers are constituents of mine, and I believe they have a right to be heard here. I think I ought to present some such matters as would at least fairly give some of the views that would make a hearing on both sides of this subject. I shall not do so now, because in proper time we will be before the Senate on the bill introduced by the junior Senator from Iowa, but at that time I shall go into the matter.

I think there is very much that the Senator from Iowa has said that is based upon misinformation; there is much of it that is based upon prejudice; and there is still more of it that is based upon ignorance. If the amount of merchandise handled by the National Wholesale Grocers' Association alone were considered—four billion dollars' worth of it every year, four billion dollars' worth of merchandise handled by this occupation alone, and there are 4,000 of them—if they charged the same rate of profit that the packers get out of their business, both large and small, whether it is Mr. Kingan, that firm over in Des Moines, Iowa, a small packer, but nevertheless a good one—if the National Wholesale Grocers, and they comprise practically all of them, would take for their profit what the packers, large and small, take for their profit, and the reduction were carried along to the retail grocer, and by him carried along again to the consumer on the sales he makes, there would be such a drop in the actual cost of living as to be matter of surprise to every consumer in the country.

When that bill is reached, Mr. President, I shall wish to take it up at some length; but I yield now for the passage of the appropriation bill.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am a good deal surprised at the statement that has been made to the effect that it will cost 4 cents to brand or stamp each piece of meat. Of course, I have no expert knowledge on that subject, but it strikes me that there will be a pretty large per cent of profit in it. I know that some of the ways of dealers are dark and devious, and I know that from my own State came a number of inspectors, when this legislation was pending, and insisted upon this amendment in the form that it now is, and at least one of them detailed to me the large amount of loss to the consumer by having the consumer pay for all of this moist and bloody paper, and so forth, that is used in wrapping up this meat.

It may be that if we pass this bill in its present form, some other means of skinning the public will be devised; but the argument which has just been made, when reduced to its final analysis, means this, that if certain prominent firms of the country that put up this meat can not be permitted to skin the public in one way, another way will be devised whereby they will do it. That is the logic of the situation. We can camouflage it as we please, but that is the fact.

I am willing to vote to retain this provision in the bill as it now is; and if that does not meet the situation, then I am ready to adopt some further legislation, such as experience may seem to approve.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, just a word. As I introduced this amendment in the committee, I want to say just a word against its assassination at this time by the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Illinois.

It developed at the hearings that a very large fee was paid by the packers to have the former solicitor of the Department of Agriculture come down and get this ruling out of the Agricultural Department. Now, the proposition is rather a simple one, I believe. It may work out badly, as these two Senators have suggested. Probably the price will be put up instead of being put down. That is probably so, no matter what we do; but, now, what is this proposition?

There are about 45,000,000 wrapped hams and pieces of bacon that receive Government inspection yearly. The average weight of the wrappings of each of these packages is 6 ounces, or three-eighths of a pound. With the paper costing 8 cents a pound, the wrapping of each of these packages costs the packer 3 cents. When they sell it, and sell this paper at bacon prices and ham prices, as they have been doing and can do under this ruling, the average selling price for the paper at the price per pound of the meat in it is 16 cents, or a gain of practically 13 cents a package.

Now, take the figures:

The cost to the packers of the paper for 45,000,000 packages at 3 cents is $1,350,000.

The packers' selling price of the same paper at 16 cents is $7,200,000.

Or a gross gain to the packers of $5,850,000.

From that deduct wrapping expense, freight, and overhead, about $450,000, leaving a net gain of $5,400,000. That is about 400 per cent on the paper, and that is passed on to the consumer.

Now, this may be passed on to the consumer. I suppose it will be; but we have not tried the plan that is now proposed under this amendment, and we might try it.

Then, on the pork-loin paper, in which the pork loins are wrapped, there will be another profit of something like a million dollars.

All those who believe in paying bacon prices and ham prices for the paper and string around their bundles ought to vote for the motion of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply want to say, in answer to the Senator, that I hardly think it is fair to say that the former solicitor of the Department of Agriculture came down here and got that ruling. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the Supreme Courts of Washington, Minnesota, and Nebraska have held the same way. There have been numerous decisons in the lower courts, and the attorney generals of California, Montana, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and West Virginia gave opinions to the same effect; and when the decision of the department was appealed to the Attorney General, Mr. Gregory, he upheld the decision of the department.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. Perhaps it ought not to be stated in that way. He was employed as counsel, and his services were so eminently satisfactory to the packers that in the correspondence, which was before the committee, it appeared that they increased the fee that they had proposed to give him because of his very successful work.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, he only took the position that most of the courts of the United States—all of them where the question has been brought before them—have taken.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say in relation to the selling of strings and paper on hams that the Senator knows very well that whatever wrappings are put upon any article, I do not care whether it is rice or whether it is a patent medicine or whether it is woolen goods or what not, whenever the article itself is put either in a can or a paper box or wrapped in paper and tied with strings, they are all taken into account in the cost of the production of the articles themselves. So it is with ham; so it is with bacon. It is a straight business proposition; and all the appealing in the world to the prejudices against the packers will never change the business principles.

I want to say further, Mr. President, I know that if this provision becomes a law the consuming public in this country will pay more than it has paid in the past.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to say to the Senator from Utah that the representative of one of the packers appeared before the committee, and was allowed to make his statement with reference to this provision in the bill, and the committee considered the matter very thoroughly. I think I might state that the committee were practically unanimous in reporting out the bill with this provision in it. Now, at this time, after the bill has passed both Houses three times—it is the third time, now, that the House has passed practically the same bill—why should we at this time strike out any of these provisions which have been agreed to when we have been in conference for weeks? I ask the Senator from Utah that question.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will answer that by saying that it makes no difference when legislation is disagreed to, either in the House or in the Senate, if it is bad; and I say that this legislation is bad.

Mr. GRONNA. Does the Senator believe that the committee of conference will agree to striking this out?

Mr. SMOOT. I can not say; but that is not for us to decide. That is for the conferees to decide. I want to say, Mr. President, that it is our duty to do what we think is right; and it is the Senate's duty, if they think this is going to throw a burden upon the consumers of the United States, to strike it out, and then if the conferees do not agree, that is another question.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not want to engage in any controversy with the Senator from Utah as to the probability of the packers increasing their price to the consumer. Mr. McCabe did state that it would cost $4,500,000 a year to do this work; but if you figure out what it costs the consumer for wrapping paper, and not only wrapping paper and string but many other things which are wrapped up with meats, you will find that on a small piece of meat, 5 or 6 pounds, the wrapper weighs at least a half pound. At the rate of 40 cents, and in some cases 60 cents, a pound, that means at least half a pound.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator that I do not want to repeat my argument upon this question. I know that there are about 6 ounces of paper and string around a 12-pound ham. Everybody knows it; but it is taken into account in the cost of the article, and the cost of the article regulates the price at which it is sold. It is just the same as if I had a bolt of cloth, and I put a paper wrapper around it, and fastened the wrapper with twine, and I had the yardage marked upon it. Every particle of labor and all the material used is figured in the cost per yard of the bolt of cloth which is so wrapped.

Mr. GRONNA. I believe I am safe in making the statement that the public is willing to pay for this work.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah one question.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I shall be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator says—and I think he says very correctly—that in all goods that are sold in packages or in containers the cost of the package or the cost of the container is added to the cost of the article. That, however, does not answer the statement made by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. SMOOT. No; Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Iowa says that in the case of hams and bacon the price at which the paper in which they were wrapped was sold was 300 per cent more than the cost of the paper.

Mr. KENYON. Four hundred per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, is that true? If that statement is true, the Senator has not answered the argument at all.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not think it was necessary, because the Senator knows that, for instance, the lacquered boxes in which tea is put up cost a great many times more than all the tea that is in them, and if he will permit——

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator does not mean to say that in adding that to the cost of the tea they do not add more than the cost of the container. The point of the Senator from Iowa is that in this case they add three or four hundred per cent more than the cost.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator loses sight of the fact that the cost of whatever paper or string used in wrapping the ham becomes a part of the cost of the ham itself; and whatever the cost is, that is the basis of the price it is sold for. It makes no difference, then, as to what it weighs. Even if the paper were a greater part of the weight of the ham, it would be taken into consideration as to the cost of the meat itself. The Senator knows it, and everybody else knows it; and it is the same with everything that is put up wrapped in paper. Whether you wear it or whether you eat it makes no difference. It is a part of the cost of the article that is wrapped, and so it is with the ham.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if the position of the Senator from Utah is correct, then it must follow that the packers would be tempted to put 10 pounds of paper around an 8-pound ham.

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all.

Mr. POMERENE. And that kind of a temptation ought not to be placed before them.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that is perfectly ridiculous. That shows just exactly the mind of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Of course it is ridiculous, but it is the only legitimate conclusion that one can reach from the Senator's logic.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will just bear with me a moment, I will conclude. I want to say, Mr. President, that there is no need of discussing a question of this kind with a Senator who would make such a statement. It is building up a straw man and then throwing dough at him. There is nothing to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time and passed.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, it was my good fortune this morning to read an article appearing in the Los Angeles (Calif.) Times of July 14, entitled "An unanswerable argument," referring to the President's statement that a league of nations for the purpose of continuing to enforce the terms of the treaty of peace is absolutely necessary and inseparable from the treaty itself. I do not want to take up the time of the Senate by reading it. I ask that it may be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not going to object. I am not going to object to these requests until the Senate itself wants to do it. I think the proper thing to do, every day that the Senator from Mississippi comes into this Chamber and puts in the RECORD a long string of editorials and opinions from Tom, Dick, and Harry, is that somebody ought to put in something on the other side to assist——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have not yielded the floor yet.

Mr. SMOOT. I presume the Senator wants to ask for more insertion, and I am not going to object if he desires to put others in; but I want to say this to the Senate, the other day it cost the Government over $1,000 for editorials and stuff that were put into the RECORD by one Senator——

Mr. WILLIAMS. It was not this Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. And I do not believe it is worth it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I did not yield to the Senator. I submit that request.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator already had submitted it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

AN UNANSWERABLE ARGUMENT.

When President Wilson informed the Senate that it would be impossible to establish permanent peace without making provision for a continuing cooperative alliance to enforce the terms of the treaty he advanced an argument in support of a league of nations that is unanswerable. There are so many continuing contracts, obligations, bargains, and agreements that a continuing association with the duty of seeing that they are carried out is indispensable. Otherwise, who should determine whether the obligations had been met, the bargains kept, the contracts fulfilled in the years to come?

If there were no other argument for a league of nations, this one presentation of imperative needs would be conclusive.

Germany signed the peace treaty under protest. She would break it to-morrow if she dared. To Germany the one supreme law is force; her people will obey no other. If she were left to face France alone, she would probably go to war to-morrow to retain the Saar Basin. She would take chances against any single one of her late antagonists before she would make the necessary territorial renunciations to reconstitute ancient Poland.

Treaties mean nothing when dealing with such peoples unless there is a compelling force behind them. Any breaking of the alliance that triumphed over German despotism would be a signal for loosing anew the barbarian hordes beyond the Rhine. There are millions of them left, and the peace which they signed through compulsion has not made of them different beings from what they were in 1918.

There is no gainsaying that a league of free nations is a practical necessity. If such a league were not formed, the association of powers that broke the German military machine would have been dissolved when the treaty was signed. What, then, about the German reparations made to continue over a series of years? What prospect would there be for Belgium to enforce her treaty rights against Germany if there were not the same association of powers back of her that made Germany admit those rights? How could mandatory powers be intrusted to certain nations if there were no association of nations to see that those powers were not abused? Who would decide whether Germany was keeping her treaty obligations? Many of the settlements attempted by the conference are admitted by the commissioners to be experimental. If they do not work well, the league of nations provides the machinery to make the necessary revisions.

To dissolve the peace conference without providing an association of powers to enforce the decrees of the peace treaty would be to leave the world in a state of anarchy. The thought of such a thing is inconceivable. The President never spoke truer words than when he said:

That there should be a league of nations to steady the counsels and maintain the peaceful understanding of the world, to make not treaties alone, but the accepted principles of international law as well, the actual rule of conduct among the Governments of the world had been one of the agreements accepted from the first as the basis of peace with the Central Powers.

That the affairs of the world have reached a condition where international cooperation is necessary to avoid anarchy is indisputable. If the peace conference were to adjourn sine die without forming a continuing association of powers to act in concert on international questions it would have to reassemble within six months. And Senators who are so mentally blind as not to recognize this self-evident truth are sorry representatives of a great people.

One has but to peruse the covenant of the league of nations to discover that the association so formed is inevitable. The most cogent criticism to be aimed at the covenant is that the bonds which unite the nations are too loose, not too binding. To what does America pledge itself in joining the league? Simply that she will assist, for the present at least, in enforcing the terms of the peace treaty. It is not an indissoluble association, such as is formed by the American Constitution. Any nation can withdraw by giving two years' notice of her intention so to do. It does not, and could not, compel this country to take part in any European war if our people were not so minded; for the Constitution of our country places the declaration of war in the hands of Congress, and one Congress can not bind its successor to any course of action. President Wilson reminded the Senate that this condition was discussed at length in the peace conference.

President Wilson is said to have told Senators in the anteroom of the Senate Chamber that the American commissioners were disappointed in the Shantung provision, and that they would have preferred to name at once the amount of money reparation Germany would be required to make. But it must be remembered that the peace conference had been in session for six months and that the nerves of the people of the world were getting on edge. A treaty was necessary. If wholly satisfactory settlements could not be agreed upon in the midst of the confusion and the passions of Europe, the single alternative was to form a tribunal that could reconsider and revise some of the decrees after order had been restored among the nations. To insist upon everything at this time was to get nothing. Practical solutions were obligatory.

To attempt to dissociate the league of nations from the peace treaty would be to nullify the treaty in its enactment. If the league were not formed from choice it would have to be established from necessity. The men who continue in the opposition are simply impossible as national representatives.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a short article by Henry W. Williams, the great historian and publicist, in answer to Mr. Root's suggestions, showing that they are perfectly mischievous. I ask that it be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Extract from "The Evening Sun" Tuesday, July 1, 1919.]

MR. ROOT'S SUGGESTIONS ARE MISCHIEVOUS.

(By Henry W. Williams.)

As the Senate appears to have fallen back on the suggestions of Mr. Root, it would seem to be well to consider the situation which will result if such suggestions be followed. Mr. Root in his letter to Senator Lodge recommends that the Senate should act upon the treaty of peace as follows:

"The Senate of the United States advises and consents to the ratification of the said treaty with the following reservations and understandings to be made a part of the instrument of ratification."

And then suggests three reservations or amendments:

1. That the tenth article of the covenant for the league of nations should be excluded from the treaty.

2. That article 1 of the covenant for the league of nations should be amended so as to modify the terms of withdrawal from the league.

3. In effect, that a new clause should be added to the covenant for the league of nations setting forth:

"That nothing therein contained shall be construed to imply relinquishment by the United States of America of its traditional attitude toward purely American questions, or to require the submission of its policy regarding questions which it deems to be purely American questions to the decision or recommendations of other powers (whatever this may mean)."

The powers of the Senate of the United States with reference to treaties are well set forth by Mr. Justice Brown in his concurring opinion in "The Diamond Rings," 183 U. S., 182. Referring to the resolution of the Senate purporting to construe the treaty between Spain and the United States, made upon the conclusion of the Spanish-American War, Mr. Justice Brown says:

"To be efficacious such resolution must be considered either (1) as an amendment to the treaty, or (2) as a legislative act qualifying or modifying the treaty. It is neither.

"It can not be regarded as part of the treaty, since it received neither the approval of the President nor the consent of the other contracting power.

"A treaty in its legal sense is defined by Bouvier as a 'compact between two or more independent nations with a view to the public welfare' (2 Law Dict., 1136), and by Webster as 'an agreement, league or contract between two or more nations or sovereigns, formally signed by commissioners properly authorized, and solemnly ratified by the several sovereigns or the supreme power of each State.'

"In its essence it is a contract. It differs from an ordinary contract only in being an agreement between independent States instead of private parties. Foster v. Neilson, 2 Pet. 253, 314, 7 L. ed., 415, 435; Head Money Cases, 112 U. S., 580, sub nom. Edye v. Robertson, 28 L. ed., 798, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep., 247. By the Constitution (Art. 2, par. 2), the President 'shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

"Obviously the treaty must contain the whole contract between the parties, and the power of the Senate is limited to a ratification of such terms as have already been agreed upon between the President, acting for the United States, and the commissioners of the other contracting power.

"The Senate has no right to ratify the treaty and introduce new terms into it which shall be obligatory upon the other power, although it may refuse its ratification, or make such ratification conditional upon the adoption of amendments to the treaty. If, for instance, the treaty with Spain had contained a provision instating the inhabitants of the Philippines as citizens of the United States, the Senate might have refused to ratify it until this provision was stricken out. But it could not, in my opinion, ratify the treaty and then adopt a resolution declaring it not to be its intention to admit the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands to the privileges of citizenship of the United States. Such resolution would be inoperative as an amendment to the treaty, since it had not received the assent of the President or the Spanish commissioners."

Mr. Justice Brown proceeds further to point out that such resolution can not be considered a legislative act modifying the treaty, because it never was passed by the House of Representatives or received the signature of the President.

It has also been determined by Chief Justice Taney in the case of Doe v. Braden (16 How., 636) that treaties can be amended by stipulations included in the ratification thereof by the parties thereto; but in that case, as Chief Justice Taney points out, such stipulation was formally written in by Spain and the treaty again ratified with the stipulation in it by the Senate of the United States and the President.

If, therefore, the suggestions of Mr. Root should be adopted and the reservations and understandings suggested by him should be made a part of the instrument of ratification, they would become a part of the treaty, provided the treaty as thereby amended was ratified by the other parties thereto. Failing such ratification, however, by the other parties thereto the ratification by the Senate would never take effect, the result being the same as if the Senate had rejected the treaty.

Mr. Root, apparently realizing that the law might be as above stated, suggests that the consent of the four great powers, to wit, Great Britain, France, Japan, and Italy, should be obtained. For various reasons, however, they might refuse to concur—France, possibly, on the ground that the first amendment weakened its protection against Germany; Japan, to obtain further concessions on its own behalf; Italy, to reopen the Fiume question. And it might well be that even if the four great powers did concur, objection might be raised by some of the South American Republics to the third reservation or amendment.

But, more important than all, under the law laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States the treaty could not take effect as to the United States until the proposed amendments had been concurred in by Germany, and what reason is there to believe that Germany would concur? Its interests would apparently lie to the contrary. By nonconcurring it would either compel the United States to withdraw from the league of nations altogether and to establish a separate negotiated and not dictated peace, or it would force upon the United States the humiliation of withdrawing its proposals.

By the time these amendments were proposed the treaty would probably have been ratified by Germany and three of the great powers, and by its terms would have taken effect, and Germany could not be compelled to concur.

The adoption of Mr. Root's suggestions, therefore, would apparently put the United States in a false and humiliating position, with the ultimate result that it would either have to recede from its proposed amendments or reject the treaty.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I hold in my hand certain resolutions of certain citizens of the State of Maryland in favor of the adoption of the league of nations, and ask that it be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Resolutions passed at conference of Maryland Branch League to Enforce Peace, Belvedere Hotel, Baltimore, Md., July 16, 1919.

Whereas the treaty of peace with Germany is before the Senate of the United States, and the welfare of the United States and the world requires that this treaty be ratified; and

Whereas said treaty has been ratified by Germany and when ratified by three of the great powers will take effect, and thereupon can not be amended without the consent of all of the parties thereto; and

Whereas when said treaty has taken effect no party thereto has any legal right either to demand or enforce the consent of the other parties thereto to any amendment; and

Whereas it is believed that reservations incorporated in the instrument of ratification would constitute amendments, which would amount to a rejection of the treaty unless consented to by the other high contracting parties: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Maryland Branch of the League to Enforce Peace respectfully requests the Senate of the United States to ratify this treaty without amendments and without reservations which are to be incorporated in the instrument of ratification.

Judge WM. H. ADKINS, Easton, Md.,
Dr. THOMAS FELL, Annapolis, Md.,
Mr. RENO S. HARP, Frederick, Md.,
Judge OSCAR LESER, Baltimore, Md.,
Committee on Resolutions.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I hold in my hand certain resolutions passed at a meeting held in commemoration of Mississippi's dead soldiers by certain citizens of Mississippi, asking the Senate to ratify the treaty of peace, together with the league of nations.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMEMORATIVE OF JAMES D. M'DONALD—A PATRIOTIC STATEMENT BY ARMY BOYS.

A memorial service in honor of one of our Army boys took place in the largest church in Philadelphia, Miss. The people filled the auditorium, which was beautifully decorated by the women of the Red Cross with flowers, ferns, and United States flags. The singing was inspiring. The splendid address by Hon. J. M. Wadsworth and the excellent sermon by Rev. C. P. Thrailkill were very appropriate, forceful, and patriotic. At the close of the commemorative service three military men, two of whom had rendered service in France, came to the rostrum and submitted to the large audience the following statement, which was adopted unanimously, except one man:

"We, citizens of Philadelphia, Miss., and all others attending this memorial service held July 13, 1919, in loving memory of James D., son of Rev. and Mrs. J. F. McDonald, who was a volunteer member of the Expeditionary Forces in France, are glad to know that when the summons came, calling him to a higher life and service in the citizenship of heaven, he was at his post faithfully serving his country as postal clerk at Brest, France, and that he joyfully obeyed the summons. By his death he has won the highest and most significant decoration. That decoration is not a medal. Medals only adorn the uniform. The distinguished decoration which he has won is the wooden cross which stands above his grave in Lambezellec Cemetery, 3 miles from Brest.

"Since Christ spoiled the powers of evil, triumphing over them in His cross, the cross is no longer a symbol of sorrow and shame, but of victory and triumph. Sixteen hundred white crosses adorn the graves of our American boys in Lambezellec Cemetery. Each is a silent reminder that the World War was a stupendous contest between Bethlehem and Berlin, between Christ and the powers of evil, and the cause of righteousness has gained the victory.

"Autocracy has been hurled from its throne. The Old World order, which made it possible for a few men to plunge the nations of earth into war, has been overthrown. A new international world order to safeguard the world against anarchy and the recurrence of war is to be built up. The purpose of the league of nations covenant is to establish such an order, an order which shall make it impossible for a few men to thrust war upon the world, slaughter millions of men, outrage womanhood, crucify childhood, and martyr old age. Such an order is what we desire to get out of the war for the good of universal humanity and for the sake of all our Army boys, those who gave up their lives to vindicate the cause of an outraged humanity and a menaced liberty, and those who helped to vindicate the same cause and still survive. For such an international order we stand and will ever stand.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not objecting to that; but I hope that this outrageous practice will stop at some time or other. I have some regard, at least, for the Treasury of the United States. I may be wrong in it, Mr. President; it may be a waste of time; but I want to say that at some time or other the American people will demand that we insist upon the expenditure of public money in the proper way.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought the Senator had.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, Mr. President, so that this will not be all one-sided, I have here an article by a professor of political science of Johns Hopkins University, Dr. W. W. Willoughby. It is upon the question of the Shantung robbery. I ask that this article be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Utah a question?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. Would it not be a good idea to stop this practice, and to compel the Senators to read all the articles they put in?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have thought many times of doing that. There were about a dozen Senators only yesterday discussing this question, and I said: "What is the use of it, unless the Senate will stand by me in it?" They said they would do it, and if I thought there was a majority of the Senators who would do it, no more articles would go into the RECORD unless Senators stood upon the floor and read them into the RECORD. I think that is what will have to come before the practice is stopped, but I do not want to do it until in the Senate there is a sentiment sufficient to justify it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, the article submitted by the Senator from Utah will be inserted in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CHINA, JAPAN, AND THE WESTERN POWERS—DEMOCRACY AND THE EASTERN QUESTION.

(By Thomas F. Millard. New York: The Century Co.)

This is a work with a single purpose—to point out the significance of the recent acts of Japan, especially with regard to China, and to indicate what should be the policies of the western powers in the light of these acts. It is not unlikely that most of its readers, without any special knowledge of conditions in the Far East, will close the volume with the impression that it is a piece of highly colored special pleading and that its recommendations are to be accordingly discounted. And yet the volume gives an accurate account of the part that Japan has played during the last few years in the Far East. The writer of this review has spent a good part of the last four years in the Orient and has made every possible effort to obtain a knowledge and understanding of the political situation there presented and has thus been able to check up most of Mr. Millard's statements, and has found them correct.

It is not too strong a statement to say that Japan's record with regard to China has been uniformly, since 1906, an oppressive and immoral one, glossed over by repeated assertions of friendliness, but controlled by the determination to demoralize China and thus provide an opportunity, as well as an excuse, to increase Japan's political influence and control in that country. Japan can point to no single act on her part that has been affirmatively and disinterestedly helpful to China. On the contrary, in South Manchuria and Shantung, where her control has been predominant, she has permitted extensive smuggling in fraud of the Chinese revenues and to the prejudice of fair competition with the other powers trading with China; she has allowed the importation and sale of morphia in large quantities, in many cases with the open aid of her consuls, from which large profits have accrued to herself and infinite injury to the Chinese people; she has exported from China, contrary to Chinese law, enormous quantities of copper "cash"; she is the one nation that has arbitrarily refused to allow the Chinese customs authorities to examine postal parcels sent into China from Japan through the post offices which she maintains in China; she alone, during the war, prevented China from taking steps similar to those taken by the other nations of the world to conserve her supply of silver; in the tariff-revision commission which was recently held at Shanghai to revalue goods for customs purposes it was her representatives who made it especially difficult to secure for China the effective 5 per cent ad valorem duties which under treaties she is entitled to levy; in many well-established cases in Shantung, through her control of the railways and railway zones, she checked the efforts of the Chinese authorities to suppress the brigandage that is prevalent in that Province; and through the importation of arms and munitions and the many loans which her bankers have made during the last three years she has knowingly made possible the continuance of the civil strife that has devastated so many of the Provinces and made impossible the institution of administrative and financial reforms in China. It is true that these loans have not been made directly by the Government of Japan, but in her own official reports she has described the manner in which she has given to her banks additional powers in order that they might negotiate and float these loans, and by the issue of belated restraining orders she has shown that there never was any lack of legal power to put an end to such deliberate financial debauchery of the Chinese politicians.

Earlier in the war Japan vetoed the proposition that China should come into the war upon the side of the Allies and, after her consent to this step was finally purchased and China had become a belligerent, she entered into agreements with the military leaders in China, whom she was able to control, whereby it was made practically impossible for China to take any military steps without her consent. These military conventions, the exact terms of which Japan insisted should be kept secret even from her own allies, provided for joint consultation and action on the part of the two countries upon the northern border of China, but, in fact, when action was finally taken China's voice played absolutely no part. Indeed, through her control of the South Manchurian railways, Japan prevented, in a very large measure, the transportation of those troops to the Siberian border which China was anxious to send. Of events in Siberia the reviewer has no personal knowledge, but all his information is to the effect that many acts of the Japanese officials there tended to keep alive the contests among the several factions and thus to render more difficult for the Allies the solution of the political and military problem. The contest between China, Japan, and the Allies with regard to the status and operation of the Chinese Eastern Railway running through the north of Manchuria constitutes an interesting story in itself. Certain it is that, after coming to an understanding with the United States and the Allies as to the number of troops she was to send to Siberia, Japan at once passed ten times that number into that country and North Manchuria.

The whole record of Japan in Manchuria since 1906 has been one of continual violation of those sovereign rights of China which Japan has repeatedly undertaken to respect and a disregard of the substance, if not the letter, of the open-door doctrine.

In the forefront of Japan's offenses in China are her actions in Shantung. This part of the story is now becoming more or less known in the western world, but, in view of the provisions of the treaty of peace that bear upon this point, it is important that the essential facts should be again stated. From the beginning to end the Shantung story reflects discredit upon all the parties concerned, with the exception of China, which has at all times been the helpless victim. In 1898 Germany forced from China the lease of the Bay of Kiaochow and the surrounding territory, including the city of Tsingtau, together with valuable railway and mining rights in the Province, the only excuse for this act of aggression being the fact that two German Jesuit priests had been killed by bandits. Thus was inaugurated a series of demands on the part of the other powers for leases to spheres of interest in China which, by provoking a legitimate antiforeign feeling upon the part of the Chinese, did much to bring about the Boxer outbreak of 1900.

At the outbreak of the Great War in 1914 Japan at once entered as a belligerent, moved to this action, most of her statesmen have asserted, by her obligations under the Anglo-Japanese alliance. This obligation has, however, been denied by Ambassador Ishii. An ultimatum was sent to Germany to evacuate Kiachow and to surrender possession to the Japanese, with a view to the eventual return of the territory to China. Official statements were made to the world by the Japanese that they had in view no territorial or other advantages that would be in derogation of the rights of the Chinese or of the western powers. From the beginning, however, it was evident that more than military considerations were to control. Japanese troops were landed on the coast of neutral China a hundred miles from Tsingtau and military occupation of the railways was pushed westward to Tsinanfau, the capital of the Province, more than 250 miles distant from the ostensible object of the military expedition. Not content with military occupation extending to the very heart of this great Province, which in size and population practically equals Great Britain, the Japanese openly disregarded the territorial sovereignty of China and instituted civil governments at various points along the railway line, and even at Tsinanfau itself.

In the spring of 1915 came, like a bolt out of the blue, the 21 demands presented by Japan to China, one group of which related to Shantung. There is not space here to review the scope of these demands, but certain of their general characteristics and of the circumstances attending their presentation can not be too often emphasized.

1. In the first place the demands were presented directly to Yuan Shih-Kai, the President of the Republic, and not through the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, as ordinary diplomatic usage would have required. Yuan was told that he must not divulge the fact that demands had been presented to him, and he was given to understand that if he acceded to them he might be assured of Japanese aid in the promotion of his own ambitions, but that if he did not accede the Japanese Government would not hold itself responsible for acts that might be taken against him by disaffected parties who, as he knew, were to be found in both China and Japan.

2. These demands, if they had been fully granted by China, would have made of China virtually a dependency of Japan, and have been in flagrant violation of the treaty rights of other powers in China. Especially was this true of the now famous "fifth group," into which the demands of a general and comprehensive character were gathered. So strong in the end became foreign pressure that Japan consented, not to abandon, but to postpone this fifth group of demands for future discussion—a status which they still retain.

3. The 21 demands were, for the most part, not in settlement of previously pending controversies between China and Japan, and they were not advanced on the ground that Japan had suffered wrongs from China for which compensation was due; nor were there any treaty or other promises obligating China to surrender the important rights that were demanded. The only justification put forward at the time by Japan was that the arrangement proposed would promote peace and good will between the two countries. In short, the demands were nothing more than a list of Japan's wants presented at a time when China was helpless and the other treaty powers not in a position effectively to object.

4. When, notwithstanding the injunction of secrecy, it became rumored that certain demands upon China had been made by Japan, the Japanese diplomatic officials denied the fact. When it became no longer possible to maintain this mendacious denial, the Japanese Government officially supplied the other treaty powers with what purported to be a list of the demands—a list which it presently appeared omitted some of the most important and drastic features.

5. Finally, Japan, after somewhat revising her demands and postponing, as has been said, the fifth group for future discussion, issued an ultimatum, couched in the most unequivocal terms, and at the same time took steps to strengthen her military forces in China. "It is hereby declared," the ultimatum ran, "that if no satisfactory reply is received before or at the specified time, the Imperial Government will take such steps as they may deem necessary." China was thus given no option; she had to yield; and, as a result, treaties were drawn up and signed embodying the demands that had been made. And it is upon these treaties that Japan has chiefly relied before the Paris peace conference in support of her claims to rights in the Province of Shantung.

Under one of these treaties the Chinese Government agreed "to give full assent to all matters upon which the Japanese Government may hereafter agree with the German Government relating to the disposition of all rights, interests, and concessions which Germany, by virtue of treaties or otherwise, possesses in relation to the Province of Shantung." In an accompanyng exchange of notes the Japanese ambassador to China promised in the name of his Government that the leased territory of Kiaochow would be restored to China, but only upon the conditions that the whole of Kiaochow Bay should be opened as a commercial port; that there should be "a concession under the exclusive jurisdiction of Japan, to be established at a place designated by the Japanese Government," and that there should be also an "international concession" if the other powers should so desire. In anticipation of the second of the conditions the Japanese have already marked out for themselves an area in the city of Tsingtau which includes the entire water front suitable for commercial purposes and the railway approaches and the site of the railway station. Thus, if the time comes when Tsingtau is handed back to China, it will be only the empty shell that will be returned. The former German railway and mining rights in Shantung are to remain permanently in Japanese possession, and, as regards those rights, it is to be observed that already Japan has claimed and is exercising under them privileges which Germany some time before the war had formally returned to China. In addition to the rights claimed under the treaties of 1915, Japan has since obtained additional special privileges in Shantung under secret agreements with certain of the Chinese officials.

One more important fact has to be mentioned before we come to the action upon the Shantung situation taken by the powers at Paris. It now transpires, according to secret documents that have been published, that in 1917, when, at the instance of the United States, China was again urged to enter the war upon the side of the Allies, Japan, as a condition precedent to giving her consent to the proposal, required of Russia, France, Great Britain, and Italy that they should promise that, at the end of the war, they would support Japan's claims to the German rights in Shantung as well as to possession of the German islands in the Pacific and north of the Equator, a promise which these powers then gave.

On the face of the diplomatic correspondence that has been published the consideration moving the powers to make this promise was, as has been said, that Japan should give her assent to China's coming into the war; but it is a strain upon one's intelligence to be asked to believe that the powers expected to receive from China's entrance aid sufficient in amount, not only to balance the considerable concessions which they themselves had to make to China but to compensate for sanctioning the lodgment of Japan in Shantung and the possession by her of the Pacific Islands, which would inevitably be strongly objected to by the Australians. Furthermore, Japan had not herself made such sacrifices in the war as to merit substantial payments. Indeed, from the standpoint of trade, shipping, and industry she had profited enormously by the war. One can, therefore, only speculate as to the existence upon the part of the Allies of a feeling in 1917 that they would be well advised to keep Japan as well satisfied as possible—a feeling which may conceivably have played a part in inducing the United States to consent, in the Ishii-Lansing notes, to recognize the "special interests" of Japan in China.

After all, however, the most reprehensible feature of the promises exacted and made in 1917 remains to be pointed out. At the very time that the Allies were inviting China to enter the war as their coally and pointing out to her the advantages of so doing, they were secretly agreeing among themselves to reward one of their number with spoils to be taken from China. It is impossible to imagine an act of worse faith than this, and that the statesmen of the European allied powers should have been induced to be guilty of it gives further weight to the argument that there was some reason, which it has not been deemed wise to avow, why, at the time, it was deemed imperative that Japan's wishes should be met. The United States, too, was not fairly treated, having been kept in ignorance of the fact that these engagements had been entered into.

Here in outline is the Shantung situation, with injustice, deceit, brutal force, and unfair dealing characterizing every step of its development, and yet upon it has been set the seal of approval or at least of confirmation by the powers at Paris. It is understandable that Great Britain, France, and Italy should have felt themselves bound by their promises of 1917, but why should the United States have consented to a proposition which was in flagrant contradiction of the fundamental principles of political justice and right which, through President Wilson, had been so emphatically declared? Why should America have been willing to violate the rights of a great and friendly people struggling to maintain democratic institutions for the benefit of a people whose political philosophy and practices have been strikingly similar to those of that damnable country.

The treaty of peace thus leaves politics in the Far East in a very unsatisfactory situation. It is to be hoped that the league of nations will prove an instrumentality by means of which a better condition of affairs may be secured.

W. W. WILLOUGHBY.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I wish to say something in reply to the Senator from Utah, but I do not want to take up much time of the Senate at this hour.

The object of the discussion of great questions before this body is twofold. It is partially to inform Members of the Senate themselves and partially to inform the opinion of the country. If things are said outside of this body that are philosophically more sound, logically more accurate, and really more eloquent than things which are said upon the floor, then it is just as right to send them out to the people as to send out what is said upon the floor. In fact, the body at the other end of the Capitol has a good practice which it would be well for the Senate to adopt. Over there when a man gets ready to read a long written speech he asks permission to print, and it is printed, and he does not stand there and read his own manuscript to the House.

For the same reason, when I see something that is an absolute clinching argument upon some phase or another of this great question, it would be a waste of time to force me or anyone else to read it when it can reach the people whom I wish it to reach just as well by being inserted in the RECORD, and having been inserted in the RECORD it can reach the people by being copied by the newspapers throughout the country.

The object of our existence here is not simply to listen to one another talk. We are part of the American parliament, it is true, whose business it is to parley or talk, but we talk for the purpose of informing the human intellect and for the purpose of persuading the human will; and a man like Henry W. Williams can say things so much better than the Senator from Utah or I either one can say them, and in a much shorter form, that I can reach the object of informing the human judgment and persuading the human will much more quickly and at much less expense to the public than by standing here an hour or so upon my feet and saying in an inferior way what he has said in a superior way and in a more concise way, and can therefore get it before the people in a proper way.

One of these things I inserted was from a paper which, I think, if I am not mistaken, is a Republican paper; but it is a magnificent editorial; it excels anything as an argument that I have heard in this body, with the possible exception of the first argument made by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX].

Every time we want to inform popular opinion upon this subject the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] jumps to his feet, and thinks he is funny because the things we put in the RECORD to go to the American intellect are not the words of Senators. Yesterday a Senator informed me that he thanked God he was original, and whenever anything went from him into the RECORD it came out of his own mind. I am of the opinion that there are many things that do not come out of my own mind or from the tip of my own tongue that are superior to a great many things that have come from the tip of my own tongue.

I say the Senate had better go to the other extreme and do as the House does, and when a man gets up with not a speech to make but a long document to read, if he desires to print it, let him print it, and it will save the time of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in this connection I want to say that I do not think that little doggerel the Senator put in the RECORD the other day, entitled "Now I lay me down to sleep"——

Mr. WILLIAMS. That was read.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator put it in all the same.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not think that was worth inserting. I thought I had better read it.

Mr. SMOOT. Somebody else's remarks that sprang from some man's mind that had an intellect oh! so much greater than the Senators of the United States. I read it over this morning to be sure to see whether I understood it correctly or not. I also wanted to see if the Senator really let it be printed in the RECORD. It is preserved in the RECORD, but I do not think it is a credit to the Senator or the author.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not expect that delicate piece of irony and humor to be appreciated by my friend, the Senator from Utah, who, whatever may be his merits, has thus far not earned any reputation as an appreciator of delicate humor.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I never intend to be, if the Senator calls that rubbish delicate humor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. His abilities lie in another direction. He is hard working and has sound judgment, but I think he is a little like Samuel Johnson said about a Scotchman, that, as a rule, if you want to get a joke into a Scotchman's head your only safe and reliable way of doing it would be to split his head open with a hatchet and insert it bodily. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMOOT. I want to remain that way, Mr. President.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD four editorials from the National Republican. They are written by George B. Lockwood. I consider him one of the best editorial writers on political subjects in the country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The editorials referred to are as follows:

LET THE WORLD CONSTITUTION BE CONSTITUTIONALLY WRITTEN.

"This paper protests again against the thoroughly undemocratic and unrepublican methods employed to put over on the people of this country a world constitution and a world parliament. These objections apply with equal force whether the constitution proposed be the mere beginning of a superstate or whether it be the fully panoplied world autocracy outlined in the Cecil-Wilson covenant, with legislative, executive, and judicial powers combined in one world parliament, in which this country was to have but a feeble minority voice.

"The suspicion persists that there is an Ethiopian in the woodpile in any hand-me-down, made-in-Europe plan for a league of nations in which the American people are not given the right of original suggestion, which represents in the making the usurpation of legislative powers by the executive branch of this and other governments without giving to the people of this country, supposed to be a representative republic, any voice whatever in framing a world constitution, the most important document ever presented for their consideration.

"The people of this country have been accustomed to bearing a hand in the framing of the laws which bind them. Their Constitution was not handed down to them from on high; it was written by the representatives of the States duly chosen for that particular purpose and then referred for ratification to the representatives of the people in the several States. This hand-me-down method of writing constitutions and laws exemplified in the procedure of the Paris conference is familiar enough in Europe, where governments and not the people are the sources of authority, but it is an absolutely new experience here. That such a procedure is defended by anybody in the United States is evidence that "the wiles of foreign influence" and the seduction of alien ideals are at work in America to the possible undoing of the Republic.

"Why is it seriously proposed that the question of whether the people of this country shall underwrite the political and financial and commercial solvency of the rest of the world and bind themselves to duties and responsibilities and burdens and possible sacrifices and dangers vaguely defined shall be decided in a military council assembled for the purpose of formulating terms of peace after a great war, a body totally unrepresentative in a legislative way?

"Would it not be the natural and the legal procedure for this body to settle the issues of the war, leaving the establishment of a world constitutional convention and the election of the members thereof to the various governments of the world in accordance with their usual procedure in such matters? For instance, should not the legislative representatives of the United States in such a body be chosen by the Congress of the United States rather than by the Executive merely? Is it not an act of the most supreme assurance, the most flagrant usurpation, for this peace conference to dodge all the problems properly falling within its jurisdiction and turn instead to the task, never committed to it, of writing a constitution for a world government, throwing over on this proposed world government the vast and perilous unsettled business the Paris peace conference does not seem to have the courage or capacity to finish?

"We say this question of usurpation of authority to write a world constitution and give the people of this Republic no initiative in its formulation; this organized effort so apparent throughout the country to hush criticism, prevent discussion, and hurry action; this manifest determination to deprive even the United States Senate of its constitutional part in the framing of treaties; this feverish, wholesale, strongly organized, and heavily financed propaganda against deliberation and in favor of implicit consent to anything suggested by authority—all this ought to arouse in every American the firm determination that with so much at stake the people and the Congress of the United States must have something to say in the framing of this document, rather than be content with the poor satisfaction of humbly suggesting minor amendments.

"The Paris peace conference should long ago have settled the problems arising out of the war. It should have settled them many weeks ago. It would have settled them long ago except for the stubborn persistence of certain men, acting entirely in a personal capacity, in neglecting the real work of the conference in order to take up a clearly usurped function of framing a world constitution. By this course the whole fabric of civilization, at least in Europe, has been endangered.

"It is not too late to remedy this frightful error, originating in the spirit of autocracy, that spirit this war was fought to overthrow. Let the peace conference settle the war problems. Let the allied peoples and Governments, which have won the right to leadership in this work of building bulwarks for the defense of world peace, elect through their representative legislative bodies real representatives of the popular sentiment of these several nations. Let these men deliberately and intelligently debate and decide, with due deference to American public opinion, upon a proposed plan for the permanent preservation of the world's peace; whether or not they want an international court, interpreting a comprehensive code of international law, or a world legislature. Let discussion of this vitally important project be encouraged rather than discouraged. This is democracy. This is republicanism. Any other course is autocracy, not to be accepted by any free people whose sense of responsibility has not been blunted by the aggressions of tyrannical usurpation.

"There is a right way and a wrong way of going about this matter. We want no world constitution, full of vague generalities, advocated on the ground of good intentions on the idiotic theory that contracts should be signed first and considered afterwards. We want no patchwork world constitution, with an amendment stuck on here and there to hide the blemishes and allay the suspicions of the people. We want an 'open covenant, openly arrived at' in the old-fashioned American way, in which the people, through their duly chosen representatives, exercise initiative in formulating the proposed world constitution.

"This, it seems to us, is the most fundamental issue involved in this whole matter. It is a question of representative government as against autocratic usurpation. It is a question of bringing to bear upon this question the power of deliberate public opinion in a country which has become accustomed to this method of settling questions vitally affecting the destiny of the American people, as this one does so peculiarly.

"Let the 39 Senators who signed the new Declaration of Independence and the other Senators in sympathy with their position take their stand here.

"Get peace quickly; get a world constitution deliberately and in the democratic-republican way.

"If we are true to the traditions of this Republic and of free government in general, there is no other road for us as Americans to travel."

What Washington fought to achieve
And Lincoln died to maintain,
No successor can make us believe
They won for their country in vain.

AN HOUR FOR PLACING PATRIOTISM ABOVE POLITICS.

"It is unfortunate that President Wilson and the Democratic Senators who serve only as phonographic records of their party master's voice continue to persist in playing politics with the league of nations issue.

"Of course, if it had been the desire of President Wilson or his party henchmen in the Senate to bring about the creation of a satisfactory league of nations, they would have accorded some consideration to the views of the majority Members of the United States Senate, as anticipated by the national Constitution, knowing as they did that ratification of the treaty by a two-thirds vote of the Senate was vital to the very creation of the league.

"Instead of this they have taken just the position that would be expected of politicians not primarily anxious for the adoption of a league of nations, but to force the political opposition into what they believe would be a 'hole,' by attempting to make the public believe that the Republican Senators oppose any arrangement for forming a world organization to prevent war in so far as this may be accomplished by international action.

"The President and his political organs and creatures in public life have been studiously insulting in their attitude toward all opposition to any feature of the proposals brought home from Paris. They have substituted abuse for argument and have gone deliberately to work to infuriate the opposition by personal attack and imputation against the integrity of their motives. This, of course, is not the natural policy of men anxious to secure approval of the league plan in a form consistent with American traditions and institutions.

"The meaning of the insistence of the administration that the Paris covenant must be accepted just as written or not at all is that it is not half so much interested in the adoption of a league of nations plan as in manipulating the situation to its own immediate political advantage. This is the meaning of the position taken by President Wilson that the treaty must be ratified without the slightest change or rejected in its entirety. It is accompanied by the assertion that if it be changed President Wilson will run for a third term on the issue which he has thus created.

The Democratic national politicians evidently overlook the fact that the people of this country will be able to locate the responsibility if through the unreasonable and implacable course of President Wilson and his shadows in the Capitol the country is refused the alternative of making amendments and reservations in the interests of this Nation. The course pursued of saying to the Senate, 'You must take this world constitution just as it is, without change, reservation, or amendment, or reject the whole scheme," is, of course, thoroughly un-American, thoroughly autocratic, entirely out of harmony with the spirit of American institutions. It represents an effort to substitute the fiat of one stubborn officeholder, party leader, and candidate for reelection to office, for the constitutional determination of the most important foreign question which has ever come before the American people for settlement.

"By this attitude President Wilson makes himself and his methods an issue of transcendent importance. Has the time come when we are ready in this country for a Government by one man, with every other department of Government reduced to that same pitiable servility which characterizes the present position of the Democratic Members of the Senate, who, in the interests of party, have surrendered their right of independent judgment to the will of the leader who now owns and controls the political organization to which they give their first allegiance?

"It might be well for the Democratic bosses, from the highest to the lowest, to make a little more thorough examination of the state of public sentiment in this country before they carry to its conclusion their present policy of considering this matter of the foreign relations of the United States from the viewpoint only of personal and partisan advantage. That the propaganda is practically all one way is true. Some people mistake propaganda for public sentiment; the Democratic politicians made that mistake last fall when they agreed upon President Wilson's campaign letter saying a Republican victory would amount to a repudiation of his leadership. The utter insincerity of that plea has, of course, been demonstrated by the course of President Wilson in continuing to proclaim to Europe and the world in general that he is the sole representative of the American people and the one and only interpreter of their thoughts.

"There was a time when the signet ring of an autocrat was sufficient to the validation of a treaty binding a people. Long ago, however, we emerged in this country from the atmosphere of the treaty of Vienna. European nations may suppose that President Wilson's signet ring is the official representation of the will of the American people, but on this side of the Atlantic it is fully understood that this is a representative Republic and not an unlimited monarchy that may fairly be considered the personal asset of a reigning house. The Senate of the United States, therefore, despite the vicious abuse that administration claquers continue to heap upon it because of its disposition to do the sworn duty of an American Senate, will consider this arrangement entered into at Paris, without the participation or even the knowledge of the American people, upon its merits.

"Possibly it might be good party strategy for Republican Members of the Senate to counter the move of the Democratic leaders by letting the covenant go through as it stands and thus permit the country to pass a judgment everybody knows has already been made up, upon the party in power, on domestic issues at the next election. That might be good politics, but it would be poor patriotism. This is no time for partisan maneuvering. It is a time for undivided and undiluted Americanism, and fortunate it is that despite the effort to intimidate the Senate through vast and powerful agencies of propaganda or to bribe the Senate majority by the promise of personal or party advantage through acquiescence in the sacrifice of American sovereignty and independence upon the altar of socialistic and imperialistic internationalism, the men in the Senate who are thinking of this whole problem only from the standpoint of the rights and interests of their country can not be scared or bribed to subordinate these to the supposed exigencies of politics."

IT'S TIME TO MAKE JUNK OF AMERICAN JUNKERISM.

"Through the New York World, Democratic Party organ, the administration launches its movement to gain control of the Senate, in the face of the administration's repudiation at the polls in November last, by unseating Senator NEWBERRY, who defeated the administration candidate, Henry Ford, of the Oskar II.

"It may be well for Congress to go back of the returns in the Michigan case. But when that is done, if there is anything more than thin gruel in the veins of Republicans and Americans generally in Congress, the whole question of majority rule in elections will be taken up; majority rule not only in Michigan, but in Mississippi, in South Carolina, in all the rotten-borough States through whose flagrant and notorious violations of the spirit and letter of the American Constitution the Democratic majority in the electoral college which put the present national administration in power was created.

"The hypocrisy of the outcry of the administration politicians in favor of free and fair and honest elections becomes apparent when it is recalled that there is not a State in the Union under Republican control in which majority rule is not possible under the laws and practices of the State, whereas there is not a State in the Union under Democratic domination where the laws and practices established by Democratic junkerism do not make majority rule difficult, if not impossible.

"More votes were cast in the single Republican State of Illinois in the last election than in all the States of the solid Democratic South—the old slave States, plus Oklahoma, another Commonwealth dominated by slave-State Democracy. In the State of Virginia, upon whose green fields President Wilson may look from his study windows as he writes his soulful periods about 'the rule of the people,' five-sixths of the men conscripted to fight to save the world for democracy are politically disinherited under a State constitution Mr. Wilson's Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Glass, helped to frame, and which, in violation of promise, was foisted upon the people of Patrick Henry's State by proclamation, without giving them a chance to vote upon it. Out of a total population of two and a third millions there are only 150,000 Virginians eligible to vote under the sway of a party which has put the 'mock' in democracy wherever it has been given complete control. At the election of 1918 only 50,000 votes were cast in Virginia. This condition is typical of that prevailing in all the old slave States dominated by that faction of the so-called Democratic Party now in power. In a number of the Southern States the conditions are more damnable than they are in Virginia, and it is by reason of these conditions that the present administration, in full sympathy with them, is in power. This paper has printed many columns of facts and figures on this subject. President Wilson has recently nominated as United States district attorney the Democratic State chairman in Josephus Daniels's State, under whose direction the election of 1918 was made a travesty in North Carolina, and who even issued a letter through his county chairmen to the partisan registrars whose right to control the privileges of voters in the State has been judicially decided to be absolute, directing them to violate the law by voting sick voters, although at home, under an absent voters' statute, but admonishing them not to let the Republicans know about their intentions. The question of how many United States Senators want to indicate their indorsement of such methods, and even put law-enforcement machinery in the hands of such politicians, will soon be up for public decision in the vote taken upon the confirmation of this administration nominee.

"The Federal Constitution contains a mandatory provision for the reduction of representation in Congress and the electoral college of any State which limits the number of persons privileged to vote. Notoriously the States of the solid South have reduced their voting population 70 per cent. In so doing they have disfranchised twice as many white men as black. They not only deny the ballot to a majority of the national citizenship of these States but add insult to injury by demanding the right to have this decitizenized population fully represented in the House of Representatives and the electoral college. The title of the present national administration to authority is based upon this fraudulent system, for it determined the election result of 1916.

"Upon the census of 1920 a reapportionment of Members of the House of Representatives and presidential electors will be made. It is the duty of the present Congress to determine officially the extent to which there has been suppression of the electorate in the several States of the Union. Without violation of their oaths of office Members of the next Congress can not avoid applying the penalty prescribed by the Constitution for the denial of suffrage rights to male citizens 21 years of age and over. The political leadership which says that a man is not a citizen because of his color or because of his failure to possess certain ancestral qualifications is guilty of political embezzlement when it seeks and exercises determinative political power based upon the political inheritance of which that man has been robbed. The failure of Congress to remedy this situation is a disgrace to the legislative branch of Government and to the Republican Party. It has been prevented by a combination of southern political junkers and northern political doughfaces, including Democrats, who have always been, in the North, slaves to their southern masters, and Republicans who have been deterred by alleged arguments based upon the strategy of cowardice from doing what is very clear has long been their duty as believers in free government and as sworn officials of that government.

"Again, unless the cause of free government is longer to be betrayed in the States where the dominant faction of the Democratic Party is in control, there must be Federal supervision of elections where Federal officials are chosen. Organs of the administration which favor any fraud that will help a deserving Democrat will cry "force bill," as the New York World did under the Harrison administration when an effort was made to insure a free ballot and a fair count everywhere throughout the country at national elections. At the last general election in the State of Josephus Daniels one of the 39 kinds of fraud detailed in a statement issued by a Republican State conference held at Greensboro on February 15 was that the registrar of a Republican precinct went hunting on election day, carrying the records with him, and thus prevented an election. Under a Federal election law men who pull stunts of that kind would be brought to the bar of justice instead of being awarded the local post office or appointed to United States district attorneyships by an administration which is busily engaged in supplying the export demand for "democracy."

"Yes; throw the Michigan election open in order that we may know how the poor but honest Henry Ford was deprived of a seat to which he was appointed by President Wilson, and to which he is therefore entitled by divine right. But at the same time throw open to the public gaze this whole system of rotten-borough representation, of political intolerance, tyranny, fraud, proscription, persecution, theft, and skulduggery in the States which for years have given to the Democratic Party its only hope of serious consideration as a factor in national politics. Reveal through this exposure the nauseating hypocrisy of the administration's pretense to any interest whatever in 'democracy' among the peons of Mexico and the peasants of Europe. Emancipate the old slave States from the new political slavery which puts them to the forefront in illiteracy, poverty, backward industrial development, inadequate banking facilities, bad roads, and run-down farms, and relegates them to the tail end of the national procession in almost everything that stands for human progress and the amelioration of social and industrial conditions. Restore free speech and a free press, independent thought and action, in that section which has been dominated for years by a sort of home-grown political Prussianism, and has finally introduced the people of the Nation generally to bureaucratic autocracy of a type with which Americans outside the solid-south States had hitherto been unfamiliar, thus teaching us that we can not safely be indifferent to the lynching of democracy anywhere within the borders of the Republic.

"Whether or not such a policy would immediately benefit the Republican Party is not the question. The question is whether this country is going to endure longer half slave and half free politically. The question is whether politicians are going to be permitted to pose as apostles of democracy before the world and be known as perpetrators of autocracy in their own Commonwealths. The question is whether these junkers and their official organs shall be permitted to focus the attention of the country upon the 'wrongs' against majority rule in Michigan, where free government has always prevailed, and thus divert it from the States they dominate, where by force, fraud, and legal trickery free government has been overthrown. Unless this situation be faced and attacked the emblem of Republicanism should be changed from the elephant to the rabbit."

WHY RESERVE DEMOCRACY FOR THE EXPORT TRADE.

"In his cabled message to Congress President Wilson writes:

"How are the men and women who do the daily labor of the world to obtain progressive improvement in the conditions of their labor to be made happier and to be served better by the communities which their labor sustains and advances? How are they to be given their right advantage as citizens and human beings? We can not go any farther in our present direction. We have already gone too far.

"These are questions which, before taking up with Congress, we advise President Wilson to sit down and talk over with 22 Democratic Senators from the old slave States, the leaders in public life with whom he is in closest touch and sympathy. With his intimate friends and advisers, Senators JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS and PAT HARRISON, of Mississippi, for instance, he might talk over the problem of how the men and women who 'do' most of the manual 'labor' undertaken in that State are to be 'served better' than by a vigilance committee whenever they undertake to proceed upon the theories so soulfully expressed by the President; how they are to be 'given their right advantage as citizens and human beings.' Out of a population of 1,797,014 there are 1,009,487 black 'human beings' in Mississippi, 'citizens' under the National Constitution. In his appeals to the 'proletariat,' though they may be intended entirely for Northern States politically doubtful, Mr. Wilson should not overlook their application to the States where his political associates are in control of affairs and have seen to it that 'the men and women who do the daily work' are 'kept in their places,' and from having any more hand in running their Government than the Russian serfs under the eighteenth century czars.

"After getting Mississippi lined up for the ideals President Wilson so soulfully writes about, he might call in Senators SMITH and DIAL, of South Carolina, of whose 1,515,400 people 835,843 are black 'human beings' and 'citizens' under the terms of the American Constitution; they do most of 'the daily labor' in that State. Here is a fertile field for President Wilson's endeavors, the beauty of it all being that all he will have to do to bring about his high object is to convince his own close political partners that he means what he says. Notoriously these 835,843 negro proletarians—the only real proletarians we have in the United States, by the way—are denied a look-in at the elections which provide for them a Government, and while they are counted as citizens when it comes to reckoning seats in Congress and votes in the electoral college, they are counted nowhere else. A distinguished leader of President Wilson's own party said on the floor of the Senate that when any of these negro proletarians attempted to vote 'we shot 'em, we killed 'em, and we buried 'em in the sand.' It is well known that this would happen again if any of these negro 'human beings and citizens' who 'do the work' in South Carolina attempted to exercise even that most fundamental right of citizenship—the right to vote. There is every reason to believe that President Wilson is in full sympathy with the policy of preventing these proletarians from any hand in political self-determination. If, since going to Paris, he has had a change of heart, as his message to Congress would indicate, why not prove his sincerity by cleaning his own political house, where he is absolute master of the situation, before coming to a divided Congress to press further reform in those portions of the Nation in which such denial of the 'rights' of the 'human beings and citizens' who 'do the work' is entirely unknown?

"When President Wilson has given evidence that he is talking in good faith and not merely exuding political bunk by starting to clean his own political stable in South Carolina and Mississippi there will still be plenty of work of the same kind to do in nine other old slave States, and the State of Oklahoma, dominated by the old slave-State democracy, where laws and practices are an expression of political autocracy rather than of even the most retrograde variety of democracy. Besides the black proletarians in these States who have been politically disinherited are the white 'workers' of the same States in even larger number, for the political junkers who constitute the bone and sinew of President Wilson's personally conducted party have denied the most fundamental citizenship rights of more white men than black in the State they dominate. These white men are for the most part of the laboring 'class.' Like the negro workers of the South, they seem to excite no enthusiasm among those who think of the uplift only in terms of votes that will give them personal or political advantage. Even Mr. Gompers doesn't know they are alive; at any rate, he has never uttered a word of protest against disfranchisement of 80 per cent of the wage earners of the solid Democratic States.

"Included in the dozen millions of 'human beings' and 'citizens' who have for generations been 'doing the work' of President Wilson's particular section of the country, but who are excluded from that passion for human rights President Wilson uses so liberally in supplying the northern and export trade, are hundreds of thousands of men called to the military service of their country in the war to 'save the world for democracy.' 'How are they to be given their right advantage as citizens and human beings?' For, as President Wilson says, 'we can not go any further in our present direction. We have already gone too far.'

"Yes, indeed. What is Mr. Wilson going to do about it? What are his partners in Democratic leadership who have put the 'mock' in 'democracy' and lynched majority rule through the States they dominate, in so doing, in the name of 'nigger domination,' politically disinherited more white men than black; what are they going to do about it? Southern demagogues have for years been preaching, outside of Dixie, the right of the down-trodden proletariat to rule. They have been preaching this doctrine in territory normally under Republican rule, and therefore where the 'human beings' and national 'citizens' who 'do the work' are permitted to freely and fully exercise the rights of citizenship. What's the matter with pushing this appeal south of the Ohio? If appeals to class hatred, to envy, to the prejudice against property and enterprise, to ignorance and the sense of wrong, is good in the Republican States of the Union, why not in the States dominated by the Democratic politicians and where the basis for such an appeal really exists among the 'proletariat'?

"At any rate, let the Democratic leadership of this country turn to the job of sweeping the débris from its own doorstep before unloading upon the country hypocritical gibberish about the vindication of the rights of the social and economic underdogs. Congress should demand to know of Mr. Wilson what his views are as to the rights of the southern proletariat in that portion of the country dominated by his own political machine, and where existing conditions give the lie to every profession of passion for social and economic and political equality such as he is preaching to the rest of this country and to the world. And as for Republican leadership, why does it overlook the opportunity, in view of the vivid contrast between Democratic theory and Democratic practice in the fundamentals of democracy, to slay the Democratic party with the jawbone of its own ass?"

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE J. WILLARD RAGSDALE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. J. WILLARD RAGSDALE, late a Representative from the State of South Carolina, and transmitted resolutions of the House thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions of the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
July 23, 1919.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. J. Willard Ragsdale, a Representative from the State of South Carolina.

Resolved, That a committee of 15 Members of the House, with such members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect, this House do now adjourn.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolutions which I send to the desk. I should like to state before the reading of the resolutions that at the proper time I shall have something further to say in reference to the death of my friend Mr. RAGSDALE. We were all shocked to hear of his sudden and untimely death at noon to-day. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolutions.

The resolutions (S. Res. 131) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. J. WILLARD RAGSDALE, late a Representative from the State of South Carolina.

Resolved, That a committee of 10 Senators be appointed by the Vice President to join a committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair appoints the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], and the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] as the committee on the part of the Senate to attend the funeral.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, July 24, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 23, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God, our Heavenly Father, whose life is our life, whose spirit is our spirit, whose wisdom is our wisdom, whose love is our love—all these precious gifts are ours if we shall put ourselves in harmony with Thee—let Thy blessing be upon these Thy servants; keep them in health and strength; and let Thy healing touch be upon those who are sick and afflicted, that they may come back to do the work they have been called to do. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 30 seconds.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to address the House for 30 seconds. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably absent yesterday when the vote was taken on H. R. 5276, the Nolan minimum-wage bill. I simply wish to state that if I had been present I would have voted "aye."

ABSENCE OF A QUORUM.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have a quorum to transact the public business.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri make the point of no quorum?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves a call of the House.

The question was taken, and a call of the House was ordered.

The Doorkeeper was ordered to close the doors and the Clerk to call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Anthony	Dyer	Kahn	Reed, W. Va.
Ashbrook	Eagan	Kelley, Mich.	Riordan
Barkley	Echols	Kennedy, Iowa	Robinson, N. C.
Benson	Ellsworth	Kennedy, R. I.	Rouse
Briggs	Fairfield	Kettner	Rowan
Britten	Flood	Kincheloe	Scully
Browne	Fordney	King	Siegel
Brumbaugh	Frear	Lee, Ga.	Slemp
Burdick	Gandy	Lever	Smith, N. Y.
Burke	Ganly	Little	Snyder
Caldwell	Garland	McClintic	Steagall
Campbell, Pa.	Godwin, N. C.	McCulloch	Steele
Candler	Goldfogle	McGlennon	Sullivan
Cantrill	Goodall	McKiniry	Taylor, Ark.
Coady	Goodykoontz	McKinley	Thompson, Okla.
Cooper	Gould	Mason	Tilson
Copley	Graham, Pa.	Miller	Vare
Costello	Hamill	Neely	Volstead
Crago	Hamilton	Paige	Ward
Currie, Mich.	Haskell	Parker	Wilson, Pa.
Davis, Minn.	Hicks	Porter	Wingo
Dempsey	Hull, Tenn.	Purnell	Woodyard
Donovan	Husted	Ragsdale
Dooling	Jones, Pa.	Randall, Calif.
Doughton	Jones, Tex.	Reed, N. Y.

The SPEAKER. On this call 333 Members have answered to their names—a quorum.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

REFERENCE OF A BILL—H. R. 4380.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to change the reference of the bill H. R. 4380, relative to the compensation and insurance of soldiers, from the Committee on Military Affairs to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest that that does not come up properly to-day. The gentleman should bring that up to-morrow.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am asking unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, what is the request?

Mr. STEVENSON. It is to refer to the gentleman's Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce a bill relating to compensation in insurance. I saw the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE], a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, as the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] was not present, but I have a letter from the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] stating that the bill went to the wrong committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the change of reference?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD for the purpose of inserting in the RECORD the proceedings in the awarding of a congressional medal to a soldier in my district, who was killed on the 8th of October, it being the second medal awarded in that town of 1,500 inhabitants.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BEE, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. COOPER, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma, indefinitely, on account of sickness in family.

To Mr. DONOVAN, for 10 days, on account of illness in family.

To Mr. CANDLER, for one week, on account of attending Sovereign Camp of Woodmen of the World in Chicago as a delegate from Mississippi.

To Mr. WINGO, for five days, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. MILLER, for to-day (at the request of Mr. JOHNSON of Washington), on account of illness.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. To-day is Calendar Wednesday, and the Clerk will call the roll of committees.

The Clerk called the Committee on Patents.

AMENDING THE COPYRIGHT ACT.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 3754, to amend sections 8 and 21 of the copyright act, approved March 4, 1909, the unfinished Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, no one seems to have charge of the time in opposition to this bill, and, pro forma, I shall take the hour myself, if there is no objection, and yield 35 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, can we not have some understanding with respect to the matter? I understand that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] desires to speak on a subject outside of the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. He wants to speak on postal matters.

Mr. NOLAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON] would like to have 20 minutes to speak on a subject outside of the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There is no objection to the gentleman having 20 minutes if he will not make a political speech. I have no objection to political speeches, but I want to know when they are going to come.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I want to speak on conscientious objectors.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is all right.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, if we are going to have speeches contrary to the rule, exceptions should not be made in one case and not in another. My understanding is that there is no objection to the gentleman from Missouri granting the gentleman from Tennessee 35 minutes and the gentleman from Minnesota 20 minutes, contrary to rule and not on the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I shall not make any exception.

Mr. MONDELL. Then I do not think that the gentleman should insist that he shall visé the speeches.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that it might be wise to ask unanimous consent that gentlemen speak on a subject different from the bill, because the rule requires that on Calendar Wednesday debate shall be on the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, what I want is to get 35 minutes for Judge MOON, and I do not care three hoots what is done with the other 25 minutes, so long as they do not make political speeches.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is controlling part of the time that can be yielded.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will yield 20 minutes to the gentleman, but he must not make a political speech.

Mr. MONDELL. But the speech the gentleman wants to make is a political speech, so we can not very well avoid that feature of it. It may be a political speech that will please the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I doubt it very much.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order to recognize in the time of the gentleman from Missouri the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] for 35 minutes and in the time of the gentleman from California the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON] for 20 minutes to speak not pertinent to the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am perfectly willing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that in the hour in the control of the gentleman from Missouri the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] may speak for 35 minutes out of order and that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON] may speak for 20 minutes, not on the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. NOLAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee wish to use the time now?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] will address the House for 35 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to make a partisan speech, but having been for eight years the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads I felt it was not only proper but somewhat my duty to make a purely business speech to this House on that question. It will be impossible for me in the course of 35 minutes or in an hour and 35 minutes to present all the facts, figures, statements, memoranda, and detail necessary to explain the general remarks in part which I shall make, and therefore I ask unanimous consent that these papers may be made a part of my remarks as exhibits A, B, C, and so forth.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by incorporating the papers referred to. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, every civilized nation in the world has a postal system. The authority to establish one, of course, must arise from the organic law or the supreme power of the State. Article I, section 8, of the Constitution of the United States has provided that Congress shall have power to establish post offices and post roads. In the same article it is directed that Congress shall have power to pass the necessary and proper legislation to carry into effect the provisions of the Constitution. Of course you are all aware of the rule of construction that every power that may be fairly and justly implied from the express power may be exercised for the enforcement of that expressed power. The words "to establish post offices and post roads" have not only a legislative but a judicial construction. They import vastly more than they would seem to by the mere statement of the words. You are not limited to the establishment of post offices where mail may be delivered and sent out, but you can construct roads for the carrying of the mail. You may use all manner of vehicles, wagons, horses, motor cars, steamboats, railroads, ships; you may employ all the means that are necessary. That power is implied, and it carries with it, therefore, the power, if it be necessary to do so, to build and construct all of these instrumentalities. So the power of Congress is not limited in furnishing the means by which the post offices of the United States may be conducted. Furthermore, it is judicially held that it is a constitutional monopoly of all the means of communicating intelligence which the Government desires to assume under this provision of the Constitution. Therefore you can, if you desire it and think it wise, own the telegraphs and the telephones as an adjunct to the Post Office Department.

If you are unable to obtain or even desire to do so by the legislative discretion you have you can own the material of which to build boats and ships to carry your mails, you may own the forests and manufacture it, or you can take the coal mines for the purpose of making the steam necessary to carry the mails. The power is not only extensive, but it is complete and plenary in every way. It is exclusively a Federal power and you can do any and everything necessary to carry the mails and deliver them to the people of the country. You can force the railroads to do so and tax the price, provided that it is not confiscatory. But I must not dwell upon the power of Congress along that line; it is well known. I want to speak for a moment of the organization of this department. Under the Continental Congress before the Government of the United States was established there was a postal system at the head of which there was one of the greatest and best of American statesmen, Benjamin Franklin. He laid the foundation of the Postal System. He was allowed the sum of $7,500 to conduct the Postal Service for one year when the population was less than four millions of people. Mr. Franklin was congratulated upon the fact that the receipts exceeded the expenditures by about $50, and the people at that time were well satisfied with that service. But later on under the act of 1794 the present Post Office Department was established. That was in the time of Mr. Pickering, of Pennsylvania, who was Postmaster General, I believe, and was immediately followed by Mr. Habersham, of Georgia. There were at that time—1794—in the United States 450 post offices. In 1795 there were just three more. In 1901 there were 76,945 post offices in the United States, which was the highest number obtained. The number now is 54,345 on account of post offices being dispensed with by rural routes. In 1794 the gross revenue was $128,947. The gross expenditures of the department were $89,792. The gross revenues of the department in 1918 were $388,974,962. The gross expenditures were $324,383,728. In 1789 there was paid as compensation to postmasters $1,657. In 1918 there was paid as compensation to postmasters $31,421,536. Of course, I would not undertake to state the status during the 140 years of the Government's history. In the papers which I have obtained the consent of the House to add as an appendix I give year by year not only that information but other information in connection with this matter. The Postmaster General began the service with one assistant. Now he has four. The power of the department is not only derived from the Constitution but the laws passed in pursuance of it, Executive orders and administrative orders having the force and effect of law.

Under these orders the power has been extended over the personnel of the department. The power exists in pursuance of law to cover these employees of certain classes under the civil service and to fix the tenure of office. The tendency all along in the growth, progress, and development of this great department has been to retain as far as possible those who are efficient in the service. And it may be that, in your wisdom, before a great while other steps along that line will have to be taken as to employment and retirement of postal employees, of which there are now more than 265,000.

Let me speak for a few moments about some of the laws and facts that are involved in the administration of the department. I can not enter into a discussion of all of them, of course, and I am going to make no invidious distinctions or comparisons upon these great business propositions between the political parties. Years ago, as those who were here 15 or 20 years ago know, the Congress of the United States relieved the Government from the bondage under which it existed to the railroad companies for the payment for special facilities and of exorbitant rates of transportation. Again the rate was reduced, and then came the recent measure that substituted a space basis for the weight basis in computing pay. Under the old basis you could not come within $15,000,000 of the legitimate cost of the transportation of the mail. Under the space basis you can now make a settlement with the railroads every month or quarter, in exact figures, if you desire to do it. The result of the adoption of this law has been to make steady and stable the compensation, increasing only as the mail increases, and it has produced a revenue or has saved more than $12,000,000 per annum in expenses. Of course, I can not go into the details of a discussion as to how that happened. We adopted the parcel post, and by the use of a distinctive stamp and other methods by which we could segregate the revenues it was ascertained under the parcel-post system that the Government of the United States had earned about $11,800,000 in 1916. The conditions since that time have been such that we are unable to tell what the earnings were; but they were greater.

You established a postal savings bank. My judgment at the time it was done was that it was a mistake; that it had better not be done. But time has demonstrated that I was mistaken on that question. It has been a wonderful instrumentality of the Government in the savings of the people. The revenues from that source alone last year were $1,900,000.

You all understand that the great portion of your revenues are derived from first-class mail. Second-class mail does not pay. It costs you as an individual under the present law 32 cents a pound to carry your mail across the continent, or from one point to another outside the place of mailing. It costs the magazines and newspapers only 1 cent a pound, plus a slight amount under the recent revenue act for advertisements with the application of the zone system. It is hardly consistent to say that the newspapers and magazines should pay only 1 cent or 2 cents when you pay 32 cents. It is proper that the Government of the United States give some concession to them by reason of the fact that they disseminate knowledge and information, and I would be willing to see them have concessions, even less than the cost of carriage, but that difference—32 to 1—is wrong. You have to remedy that, particularly as to these great magazines. I refer now to one magazine in the medium class, a publication that pays $5,000 revenue to the Government in stamps, and costs the Government $49,000 a year to carry it, when its profits are more than $150,000 per annum. But I pass over that question with the simple statement that the cost of the carrying of this class of mail in the last fiscal year was about $70,000,000 more than the Government received. Now, this Government ought not to submit to such a subsidy to the press or to any other power in the country. Great and powerful as the corporations of the country were—the transportation companies—you wrested from them subsidies under which they had increased their compensation in 30 years from $7,000,000 to $64,000,000. You have to wrest that power from the senders of mail matter of the second class. There is no man more friendly to the press and who has stood for it more in this House than I have; no one is more willing to make concessions than I am; but it must not demand a loss of $70,000,000 to the American people to carry their mail, mostly commercial and profit making.

There is another question, which is a rather delicate one, that I want to talk to you about.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield to a question at that point?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. How can we vote for a 1-cent postage on first-class mail matter unless other classes of mail matter come more nearly paying the cost of transportation?

Mr. MOON. That is one of the policies I want to discuss when I get some other facts before the House.

A delicate question for the Congressman, and particularly the country Congressman, is the question of rural mails. What is the situation to-day as to rural mails? The last fiscal year shows that when you charge properly the cost to that service at the initial point and terminal point, and the overhead charges that belong to it separately in the segregation of the mail, you lose $58,300,000 per annum. In other words, it took that much of money more than the receipts from that source to meet the demands of that service.

The Postal Service of the United States is a unit. Some of it may raise great revenue, some of it may produce a great deficit, but you must maintain it all. You have to serve all of the American people and give them the best possible service. I want to suggest to you, for your thought in the future, that you must find a remedy by which we can give to the country people the service that they are entitled to, which is the best, and at the same time reduce this cost. It is a matter for your thoughtful consideration. The country people are reasonable and just. They want the best service at the least cost to their country. While, of course, we all favor the proper care of and the payment of proper salaries to carriers of the mail, it is the people, at last, whose rights must be protected. If you can remedy this situation and still give an efficient and proper service, which I hope you can, and remedy the situation as to second-class mail, then the American people upon the face of the figures can have 1-cent letter postage with still a surplus of $25,000,000 in the National Treasury. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, all of the laws which we have passed that made it possible to produce a surplus instead of a deficit were not enacted previous to 1912. One of those laws was enacted at that time. Another, that enabled us to go to this position, was enacted previous to that time. Two of these laws were enacted under two administrations, one wholly Republican and another partly Republican. The others have all been enacted since the Democratic administration began. Now, it would be hardly fair, perhaps, to make comparisons, except to demonstrate the system of operation under the laws between any periods of time in these services performed under different laws and conditions, the hardest conditions having been in the last 6 or 8 years. The Postal System grows, its needs appear year by year, and the remedies to correct errors that have come into it or may come must be devised. Constructive legislation must continue to come if this great department must at last accomplish the good of which it is capable for the people. But, as showing a development of the service under valuable laws and what may be expected of other laws and better conditions which we may yet establish, it appears from the record that during the administration of President Roosevelt there was a deficit in this service of about $47,000,000, covering the last four years of that period. That was not the fault of the administration any more than it is the fault of this administration that now and then letters go wild or that the service in some places is not as good as it should be. It is the necessary result of conditions and the law controlling the department and, of course, in part as to administration. There was a loss, I say, during that period of about $47,000,000, in round figures.

During the administration of President Taft there was a loss of about $25,000,000. During the administration of President Wilson, under Mr. Burleson as Postmaster General, all of these losses have been overcome and a large surplus gained in revenues. The postal bill has gone to the enormous figure of $600,000,000, $200,000,000 of which, however, was for good roads. Yet the official figures show that these losses during that period have been overcome and that the service has been extended to 15,000,000 more of people daily than we had before; that it has been expanded and greatly enlarged; that salaries have been increased; and yet those six years, overcoming that deficit, show a surplus of about $32,500,000—not a paper profit, not a bookkeeping proposition, but actual cash turned over on the check of the Postmaster General to the Treasurer of the United States of nearly $33,000,000. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But some have said that that is due to the increased expense of postage during the war. Ah, you are mistaken. Under that law that revenue was segregated from the other, and the Post Office Department collected about $44,500,000 war revenue under the 3-cent postage act and paid that into the Treasury, and it is no part of the general profits of $32,000,000 that have been referred to.

The record shows that during the eight-year period preceding the present administration, covering the last administration of President Roosevelt and the administration of President Taft, the deficiencies in revenues as shown by the audited reports of the Postal Service were as follows:

1905 audited deficiency	$14,594,387.12
1906 audited deficiency	10,542,941.76
1907 audited deficiency	6,692,031.47
1908 audited deficiency	16,910,278.99
Total deficiency		$48,739,639.34
1909 audited deficiency	$17,479,770.47
1910 audited deficiency	5,881,481.95
1911 surplus, alleged and disputed	219,118.12
1912 audited deficiency	1,785,523.10
Total deficiency		24,927,657.40
Deficiency for the eight-year period		73,667,296.74

Audited statement for year 1911 shows surplus accounts subsequently settled reduced the surplus to a deficiency of $732,301.90.

The postal revenue as audited shows a surplus in all succeeding years, except 1915, in which the receipts of the Postal Service suffered a temporary setback after the outbreak of the war in Europe.

A statement of surpluses and deficiencies follows:

Audited surpluses by years:
1913	$4,510,650.91
1914	4,376,463.05
1916	5,829,236.07
1917	9,836,211.90
1918 (excluding $44,500,000 excess postage as war revenue)	19,626,774.08
Total surpluses	44,179,336.01
Audited deficiency 1915 (declining receipts following outbreak of war in Europe)	11,333,308.97
Net surplus for six-year period	32,846,027.04

Mr. Speaker, as stated, I can only speak at this time in a general way. There have been, perhaps, just complaints; there have been many unjust complaints against the department. You must recollect the period through which we have passed, the circumstances that might bring about these conditions, the existence of war and all of its evils and demoralization; and yet I have to assert that there have been no more mistakes made in the Post Office Department during the last few years than were ever made during any other similar number of years of its existence. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The words of envy and malice and of unjust criticism that have been uttered against the Postmaster General will be forgotten—forgotten quickly in the face of his magnificent administration, distinguished as it is for ability, honor, courage, and unsurpassed, if not matchless, loyalty to public duty. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I want to speak a word for the extension of this great department. It has already lengthened its cords and strengthened its stakes until it is reaching the four quarters of the earth. It works for you by day and by night, on land, on sea, and in mid-air, and wherever the flag of the Union floats there may be found the mails of the Republic. It gives greater benefit to the people than all other agencies of Government. Far beyond the confines of the United States, by conventions with the peoples of the earth, your mails are carried to the soldier on the battle fronts, to the sailor on the mighty deep, to the marts of commerce, to the halls of legislation, to the seats of learning, to the home, the factory, and the field, to men under every condition.

This great department may drop a missive on the sands of Arabia, on the snows of Iceland, on the Alps, at the foot of the Pyramids, on the banks of the Nile, where Leonidas fought and the Spartans fell, where the beautiful gondolas of war proudly rode the waves of the Aegian Sea, where Virgil and Homer sang, where Babylon and Ninevah were but are not, to bear the tidings of the love, the hope, and the aspirations of kindred spirits far away. [Applause.]

Strike down this means of communicating knowledge and information among the people, and the flickering light of modern civilization will fade forever beneath the coming shadows and darkness of advancing barbarism. Let me appeal to you to broaden and extend this great service, that it may aid in holding up the standard of human liberty wherever man loves freedom. Above all, let me appeal to you to encourage and care for that splendid army of intelligent men and women who so magnificently administer the Postal System. [Applause.]

Papers and exhibits referred to by Mr. MOON:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., July 14, 1919.

Hon. JOHN A. MOON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR JUDGE MOON: In reply to your letter of the 8th instant requesting certain information, you are advised as follows:

The number of clerks and officials in the Post Office Department at Washington: Clerks, 997; officials, 59.

The number of first, second, third, and fourth class postmasters in the United States: First class, 628; second class, 2,372; third class, 7,823; fourth class, 42,261.

The number of rural routes and carriers: Rural routes, 43,211; rural carriers, 43,109.

The number of city carriers: Regular carriers, 35,200; substitute carriers, 8,755.

The number of post-office clerks: Regular clerks, 46,707; substitute clerks, 11,676.

The number of railway postal clerks: 19,968.

The number of post-office inspectors: 418.

The approximate number of laborers connected with the Post Office Department: Post Office Department proper, 96; Postal Service, 2,280.

The total number of postal employees in the United States: Postal Service, 262,294; department proper, 1,374; total, 263,668.

The countries with which we have postal conventions and the rates of postage: See attached memorandum marked "Exhibit A."

The approximate cost of handling and transporting the second-class mails: See attached letter dated July 10, 1919, marked "Exhibit B."

The amount of money saved by the adoption of the space basis as against the weight basis, $11,470,708 per annum.

The approximate number of pounds of second-class mail matter in the last fiscal year, and the loss to the Government on same. See Exhibit B, hereto attached.

Profits in postal savings banks. See attached memorandum marked Exhibit C.

Statement of the receipts from the Postal Service and the expenditures from the beginning of the service to date, together with the deficiencies or surpluses, by years. See page 2 of Exhibit D attached, columns 5 and 6 of which show, respectively, the gross revenues of the department and the gross expenditures of the department from the year 1789 to the year 1918, inclusive.

List of the Postmasters General and the periods of their service. See page 1 of Exhibit D.

The increase in employees and salaries: The bases for the figures here presented are June 30, 1913, the close of the fiscal year on the 4th of March of which this administration began, and July 1, 1919, the beginning of the current fiscal year.

On June 30, 1913, there were 235,409 employees in the Postal Service, with annual salaries aggregating $176,591,358. On July 1, 1919, there were 262,294 employees, with annual salaries aggregating $274,911,832. The percentage of increase in employees during the period was 11.42, and the per centage of increase in the aggregate compensation paid was 55.67.

In the department proper there were on June 30, 1913, 1,237 employees, with annual salaries aggregating $1,440,240. On July 1, 1919, there were 1,374 employees, with annual salaries aggregating $2,040,548. The percentage of increase in employees during the period was 11.07, and the percentage of increase in the aggregate compensation paid was 41.67.

In the contract service—that is, clerks at contract stations, mail messengers, screen-wagon contractors, steamboat and Alaska star service, and star routes—on July 1, 1913, there were 25,445 employees, with an annual rate of compensation aggregating $12,232,140. On July 1, 1919, the number in such contract service was 25,124, with an annual rate of compensation aggregating $18,064,780. The percentage of decrease in the number of contractors was 1.26 and the percentage of increase in the aggregate rate of compensation was 32.3.

Increase in number of people served with daily mail during this administration: It is estimated that since March 4, 1913, daily delivery service has been extended to 7,372,800 persons by city carriers, 4,986,079 persons by rural carriers, and 1,278,000 persons by village delivery carriers, or a total of 13,636,879 persons, who prior to that time were not receiving a delivery service.

With reference to your inquiry as to the approximate profits on parcel post, I beg to advise that on account of the many additional functions and duties placed upon the Postal Establishment incident to the war and the immense amount of work required to be performed by the Postal Service, and also because of the scarcity of help, the department did not have the facilities with which nor the time in which to gather statistics on this subject, consequently the last estimate made by the department was in 1916, when the figures compiled indicated a profit in round numbers of $10,600,000 annually.

Concerning the loss on Rural Mail Delivery Service it is estimated that the cost of operating the service exceeds the revenues received therefrom in round numbers by $53,800,000, after making due allowances to other branches of the service for handling mails which pass over rural routes and deducting overhead charges.

Sincerely, yours,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., July 10, 1919.

Hon. JOHN A. MOON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR JUDGE MOON: In response to your request with respect to the loss incident to handling and transporting mail matter of the second class, I have to say that the figures pertaining to the mailings of such matter for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1919, are not yet available. I am, therefore, furnishing you the data with regard to the mailings for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1918, at the rates in effect prior to July 1, 1918.

The Hughes Commission, created in 1911 under a joint resolution of Congress to investigate the subject, found that the cost of handling and transporting second-class matter in the case of matter mailed at the cent-a-pound rate was approximately 5½ cents a pound, exclusive of certain expenses, principally for services in post offices, which, because of the limited information regarding them, the commission did not assign. The department's estimate of the cost of handling and transporting this matter, including the expenses which the commission did not assign, was approximately 8.27 cents a pound. On the basis of the department's estimate at that time, which includes the unassigned expenses, the loss incident to handling and transporting second-class matter during the fiscal year 1918 would be as follows:

Pounds mailed at cent-a-pound rate and free in county	1,229,709,355
Estimated expense of handling and transporting	$101,696,963
Amount of postage received	$11,712,068
Estimated loss in handling and transporting	$89,984,895

Since the cost of transporting free-in-county matter is somewhat less than the cost of transporting matter mailed at pound rates, and also on account of economies and improvements in the service, etc., the estimated loss as above shown may be reduced $15,000,000, thus making the estimated loss in handling and transporting second-class matter during the fiscal year 1918, $74,984,895.

Yours, very truly,

A. S. BURLESON.

EXHIBIT C.

The postal-savings law provides that interest and profit accruing from the deposit and investment of postal-savings funds shall be applied to the payment of interest due to postal-savings depositors, as provided therein, and the excess covered into the Treasury of the United States as a part of the postal revenue. Pursuant to this direction there has been covered, or there is in process of being covered, into the Treasury the following amounts:

Net interest income accruing in the fiscal year.

1915	584,176.89
1916	712,728.99
1917	1,121,901.30
1918 (estimated)	1,300,000.00
1919 (estimated)	1,600,000.00
Total	5,749,986.61

It will be observed that each year shows a substantial increase in the net interest income.

IMPROVEMENTS AND EXTENSIONS IN THE POSTAL SERVICE SINCE MARCH 4, 1913.

JUNE 30, 1919.

May 7, 1913: Order promulgating regulations requiring all postmasters of the fourth class to qualify for office through civil-service examinations.

July 1, 1913: Inauguration of C. O. D. feature of parcel-post mail.

July 1, 1913: At the inauguration January 1, 1913, of the service providing for the indemnification of shippers of fourth-class domestic mail a flat fee of 10 cents was charged, which insured an article against loss for its actual value not exceeding $50 in any case. Effective July 1, 1913, another rate was introduced which provided for the insurance of an article against loss for its actual value, not exceeding $25 in any case, upon payment of a fee of 5 cents.

July 1, 1913: Distinctive parcel-post stamp discontinued.

1913: During the year provision was made whereby sender of a parcel may attach a communication to it on condition that necessary stamps for first-class rate of postage were affixed. This permits simultaneous delivery of communication and parcel.

October 1, 1914: Inauguration of Government-owned motor-vehicle service in the large cities, superseding the contract and screen-wagon service in cities.

1914: Reorganization and standardization of post-office methods and reorganization of large offices so as to operate on a two-division plan—finances and handling of mail—permitting a flexible and compact force and increasing the efficiency of the service.

July 1, 1915: Advancement of fourth-class post offices to presidential grade where compensation if $1,000 for the year, eliminating the requirement that it must be $250 each quarter.

July 28, 1916: Compensatory time for holiday service to be given on one of the following 30 days. (Amended to include laborers, special clerks, etc.)

August 8, 1916: Regulations promulgated providing for the payment of indemnity for injury to insured mail, in accordance with the provisions of the Postal Service appropriation. Act approved July 28, 1916.

August 8, 1916: Regulations promulgated providing for a minimum 3-cent fee for insurance in an amount not exceeding $5 valuation. The popularity of this feature is evidenced by the fact that 58 per cent of all packages insured are at this rate.

August 8, 1916: Regulations promulgated providing for the maximum amount of $100 insurance on the payment of a fee of 25 cents.

March 31, 1917: Reappointment of postmasters at presidential post offices based solely on their record, and where the record of the incumbent in office requires a new appointment the creation of an eligible register through civil-service examination.

1917: Establishment of military branch post offices.

June 30, 1918: Discontinuance of pneumatic-tube service.

July 1, 1918: Discontinuance of insurance tag.

July 2, 1918: Reinstatement provided by law for all who enter military service to the salary to which they would have been automatically promoted had they remained in the Postal Service.

July 2, 1918: Modification of postal-savings law to permit deposits up to $2,500.

July 2, 1918: Compensation in lieu of compensatory time for employees.

July 1, 1918: The postal appropriation act approved February 28, 1919, provides that hereafter all days, other than holidays enumerated in the act of July 28, 1916, making an appropriation for the Postal Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, set aside by the President of the United States as holidays to be observed by other departments of the Government throughout the United States shall be construed as applicable to the Postal Service in the same manner and to the same extent as the executive departments.

During the past six years close cooperation has developed between this department and the Treasury Department in the plan of arrangement and facilities provided in new Federal buildings. As a result each office is now provided with the same relative amount of floor space, based on the estimated number of postal employees 10 years hence; several standard types of screen-line arrangement are in vogue to meet the varying needs of the Postal Service at offices of different sizes; a standard plan of providing vault and toilet facilities has been adopted; and the progress in standardization has so far advanced that at the present time it is possible to use the one set of drawings, with minor modifications, for several buildings.

PNEUMATIC TUBES.

The act of July 13, 1892, making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department, authorized the Postmaster General "to examine into the subject of a more rapid dispatch of mail matter between large cities and post-office stations, and transportation terminals located in large cities by means of pneumatic tubes or other systems."

Acting under this authority Postmaster General John Wanamaker, under date of July 26, 1892, issued an advertisement inviting interested parties to submit descriptions of pneumatic tubes "and an offer to submit test." The first pneumatic tube for the transmission of mail was used in Philadelphia in 1893 in an experimental way.

March 1, 1894, the service was formally recognized and paid for by the Post Office Department. Investigation shows that pneumatic tubes had not been a success for commercial purposes. A line of 10-inch tubes about 4¾ miles long were laid in Boston for commercial uses, but was not a success, and were subsequently leased to the Post Office Department on November 1, 1906, for the transmission of mail, at a rental of $17,000 per mile per annum, for a period of 10 years.

From 1897 to 1918, excepting 1902, when Congress failed to appropriate, a total of $11,752,567.16 had been expended for the use of pneumatic tubes.

In the early days of the pneumatic tubes Hon. W. H. Moody, then a Member of Congress, referred to previous appropriations as "ill begotten," and stated:

"* * * The first appropriation was made when Mr. Neilson was Second Assistant Postmaster General."

* * * * * * *

"Within six weeks, at the outside, after he left the office, he was given $1,000 in cash and $10,000 in stock for his services at Washington during the succeeding year. What they were I do not know. What they could properly be I could not guess, but he was given this stock. * * *

"But that is not all, Mr. Chairman; there was other testimony before the commission. I shall mention no names, and I regret extremely to have to speak upon this subject. But we found that the pneumatic-tube system in New York was constructed by contractors who took their pay in stock and bonds; that the only value which that stock and those bonds had was the contract with the Government. It was certainly unfortunate—I think nothing else, believe nothing else, but unfortunate—it was certainly unfortunate that a holder of the bonds and one of the contractors was a Member of this House and a member of the Committee on Appropriations.

* * * "As showing the methods employed by the New York company, I will state that a large block of the stock of this company, as New Year's present, was sent to a near relative of an important and influential Member of the House. I am glad to say that the return mail was not allowed to depart from Washington without carrying back that dishonoring and dishonorable gift."

The Congress fully recognized the value of the judgment of experienced postal officials in this matter and would not even trust the Postmaster General to pass on the value of the pneumatic-tube service, because he might lack expert and scientific postal knowledge, but required by the act of April 21, 1902—

"That no advertisement shall issue until after a careful investigation shall have been made as to the needs and practicability of such service, and until a favorable report, in writing, shall have been submitted to the Postmaster General by a commission of not less than three expert postal officials to be named by him."

ZONE RATES ON SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

Zone rates on second-class matter were effective July 1, 1918. Based on the amount of mail handled in 1912, it was estimated that the increased revenue in postage under this new law would be substantially as follows:

First year	$4,900,000
Second year	9,800,000
Third year	15,000,000
Fourth year	20,000,000

Prior to the enactment of this law it was estimated that at least $72,000,000 annually was lost in the handling of second-class matter.

The following have indorsed the zone rates on second-class matter and are in favor of the retention of the present law: National Editorial Association, Missouri Editorial Association, Northwestern Editorial Association, Kansas Editorial Association, and Texas Press Association.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, June 28, 1919.

The space method of payment of railroad companies for carrying the mails, with certain variations, had been approved by every commission which had studied the matter from the Hubbard Commission in 1878 to the Bourne Commission in 1913. The railroad companies, however, had been able to prevent any change from the weight basis. On August 12, 1911, Postmaster General Hitchcock transmitted to Congress a plan of payment based on space and urged its adoption. No action was taken on his recommendation.

On February 12, 1914, Postmaster General Burleson transmitted a complete scheme of payment based on space and actively championed it before the Congress. He succeeded in having it embraced in the pending Post Office appropriation bill in the spring of 1915. The organized opposition of the railroad companies was able to prevent passage of the bill prior to adjournment of Congress on March 4 of that year, so that for the first time in its history the entire Postal Service was compelled to operate for the ensuing year under the handicap of a joint resolution extending the previous year's appropriations.

The space bill was finally passed on July 28, 1916, and has been in operation since November 1, 1916. It is a scientific and businesslike method of railway mail pay and enables the department to pay for what it receives and the railroads to receive what they earn, which was not possible under the old system of average weights taken once in four years.

The annual saving to the Government under the space system is approximately $11,470,788. This large saving has resulted mainly from a more intensive loading of the mails on trains, at the same time remitting to the carriers considerable equipment to be employed in other transportation. This saving in car space amounted in the aggregate to the equivalent of 14 trains of 10 cars each daily between New York and Chicago.

The Postal Service during the trying war period was undoubtedly subject to the severest test it has ever undergone. The freight and express services were literally swamped with business, and were obliged to place embargoes on their traffic. The result was that enormous quantities of goods and products of all kinds were thrown into the parcel post, which was not subject to such restrictions. Notwithstanding the immense volume of this new traffic the parcel-post service was conducted without interruption and with dependability and dispatch.

The development of the aeroplane in warfare inspired the belief that it could be made to serve the uses of peaceful transportation, and on May 15, 1918, an aeroplane mail route on a regular schedule was established between New York and Washington. The service operates in about one-half the time required by train between the two cities and is performed with a regularity and a certainty which up to this time has not been equaled anywhere in the world.

An additional aeroplane route has recently been inaugurated between New York and Chicago which by reason of the connections made advances certain eastern mail for the West 24 hours or more. This mail leaves New York at 5 a. m. and arrives in Chicago at 1 p. m. in time for afternoon carrier delivery.

The personnel of the Railway Mail Service has been completely reorganized upon a more efficient basis and at a higher rate of pay. During the fiscal year ended June 30, 1913, 12,653,856,360 pieces of mail matter were distributed, of which 99.98 per cent were distributed correctly. During the year ended June 30, 1918, 14,134,736,744 pieces of mail matter were distributed and the percentage correct was 99.99.

On March 4, 1913, there were 17,095 employees in the Railway Mail Service. On June 15, 1919, there were 20,360 such employees, an increase of 3,265.

On June 30, 1913, the average salary of a railway postal clerk was $1,239. On May 31, 1919, it was $1,565—an increase of $326.

The travel allowance has been increased from $1 to $2 per day. Vacation allowances have been increased and working conditions and equipment and construction of cars have steadily improved.

The system of terminal distribution of mail has been developed to take care of the steadily expanding parcel-post traffic and of certain other classes of mail (circulars, etc.), which it is not necessary to distribute on trains. This service is now so efficient that almost daily appeals are made for admission to the mails of certain articles not admissible under the present postal regulations. These appeals are usually explained by the statement that the freight and express services can no longer be depended upon to handle such business.

All of these things have been accomplished during the period of the World War and despite the fact that the Postal Service has lost to the Army and Navy many of its experienced employees and has had to employ many inexperienced ones.

The war, of course, greatly interfered with the foreign mail service. Nevertheless many improvements have been effected. A fuller utilization of contract steamers for the dispatch of mails has effected large economies as well as improvements in the service.

The railroad haul of transit mails across the Isthmus of Panama has been eliminated, reducing costs and also damage from handling.

Mails for China have been routed so as to make more extensive use of the United States postal agency at Shanghai, resulting in better service.

Arrangements have been made with the Shipping Board for the cooperation of its branches at New York, New Orleans, San Francisco, and Seattle in dispatching mails on vessels under control of the board.

The efforts made to extend our foreign trade through the medium of the International Parcel Post have had remarkable results, notwithstanding the disruption of mail routes and the withdrawal of service to many countries occasioned by the war.

On March 4, 1913, when this administration assumed charge of the Post Office Department we had parcel-post conventions with 44 countries. Since then we have extended the service to 18 additional countries, making at present a total of 62 countries. Negotiations with most of these nations and colonies had been in progress for years previous without success.

Provisions of already existing conventions have been enlarged and extended to embrace larger sizes and weights and many articles theretofore barred, and through negotiation many restrictions which had handicapped us have been removed.

For the fiscal year ended June 30, 1913, the total weight of parcel post dispatched to all countries was 2,831,512 pounds. During the year ended June 30, 1918, 13,840,266 pounds were dispatched, an increase under the present administration of 389 per cent. The increase for five years preceding June 30, 1913, was only 1,694,822 pounds.

Simplification in methods of accounting and improvement in packing and preparation of parcel-post packages have been brought about. For the first time a provision for the registration of parcels with indemnity in case of loss has been introduced into the International Parcel Post Service.

It was found that under former administrations a one-sided interpretation had been given to the parcel-post convention concluded with Great Britain, which opened up to that country and its possessions the markets of the United States and its possessions, but restricted our manufacturers and exporters to the markets of the British Isles. This matter has been taken up, and the barrier has already been removed between our country and British India, Union of South Africa, Egypt, Palestine, and Mesopotamia, while it is expected that negotiations will open up the markets of the other possessions of Great Britain to our parcel-post exporters in the near future.

Negotiations are being pushed for the extension of Parcel Post Service to additional countries, and it is confidently believed that, for the first time in the history of our Postal Service, we shall soon have such facilities with every important country in the world, as well as nearly all small countries, colonies, and protectorates.

The department has made a new departure in the close cooperation which it has inaugurated with manufacturers, exporters, and representatives of foreign trade bodies. These organizations have established a permanent committee on international parcel post, with offices in New York and Washington, for the purpose of availing themselves of the information and data obtainable from the department.

For the further extension of communication and commerce proposals for a reciprocal domestic letter rate of postage have been made to a number of countries in the Western Hemisphere, and nine such countries and colonies have concluded such conventions with us.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
THIRD ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, June 25, 1919.

I transmit herewith statement of the superintendent of the Division of Stamps, showing the amount of war-savings and thrift stamps sold from the beginning of the sales period to December 31, 1918, to have been $832,279,373.63.

The statement also shows that $8,570,663.21 war-revenue stamps were sold by the Post Office Department during the same period.

The statement further discloses the fact that of the $1,015,067,470.80 war-savings and thrift stamps sold by the Post Office and Treasury Departments, 82 per cent of the total was sold by the Postal Service.

A. M. DOCKERY,
Third Assistant.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
THIRD ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, June 24, 1919.

War-savings and war-revenue stamps sold from the beginning to Dec. 31, 1918.

War-savings	$826,043,647.63
Thrift	99,830,611.00
Total sales	925,874,258.63
Thrift stamps exchanged	93,594,885.00
Net revenue received from sales of war-savings and thrift stamps	832,279,373.63
War-revenue	8,570,663.21

The total net revenue received from the sales of war-savings and thrift stamps by the Post Office Department from the beginning to December 31, 1918, was 82 per cent of the total net revenue of $1,015,067,470.80, which includes the net sales reported by the Treasury Department.

FITCH,
Superintendent Division of Stamps.

JUNE 26, 1919.

The progress and development of the Postal Savings System under this administration is worthy of special remark. The following is a summary of the principal facts concerning the operations of the system.

INCREASE IN DEPOSITS.

On June 30, 1913, at the close of the fiscal year 1913 and substantially three months after this administration assumed office, the deposits amounted to $33,818,870. The following is a statement of the amount on deposit at the close of each succeeding fiscal year and the increase in deposits during each year:

Date.	Amount on deposit.	Increase during year.
June 30, 1914	$43,444,271	$9,625,401
June 30, 1915	65,684,708	22,240,437
June 30, 1916	86,019,885	20,335,177
June 30, 1917	131,954,696	45,934,811
June 30, 1918	148,471,499	16,516,803
June 30, 1919	[1] 168,500,000	[1] 20,000,000

[1] Estimated.

On May 18, 1916, the Congress, on your urgent recommendation, amended the original postal-savings law by removing altogether the monthly limit on deposits of $100 and increased the amount that a depositor may have to his credit from $500 to $1,000. The beneficial effects of this liberalizing legislation are shown in the large increase in deposits in the fiscal year 1917 compared with the increase in the previous fiscal year. The increase in deposits in the fiscal year 1918, while substantial, was considerably less than in other years, but it will be recalled that two great Liberty loan campaigns were conducted during that year, offering investments bearing higher interest rates.

On July 2, 1919, the Congress, also on your urgent recommendation, again amended the postal-savings act by further increasing the amount that a depositor may have to his credit from $1,000 to $2,500. Very large gains in deposits followed this legislation, and while the withdrawals recently have been heavy, due to the Government loans and the return of foreign-born depositors to their homes abroad, nevertheless the increase in deposits in the current year is substantial and much greater than in the preceding year.

INCOME FROM DEPOSIT AND INVESTMENT OF FUNDS.

The postal-savings law provides that interest and profit accruing from the deposit and investment of postal savings funds shall be applied to the payment of interest due to postal savings depositors, as provided therein, and the excess covered into the Treasury of the United States as a part of the postal revenue. Pursuant to this direction there has been covered, or there is in process of being covered, into the Treasury the following amounts:

Net interest income accruing in the fiscal year:

1914	$431,179.43
1915	584,176.89
1916	712,728.99
1917	1,121,901.30
1918 (estimated)	1,300,000.00
1919 (estimated)	1,600,000.00
Total	5,749,986.61

It will be observed that each year shows a substantial increase in the net interest income.

EXPENSE OF ADMINISTERING THE SYSTEM.

The postal-savings law also requires that the board of trustees of the system shall report annually to Congress "the amount of extra expense of the Post Office Department and the Postal Service incident to the operation of the postal savings depository system." The expense of administration for the fiscal years 1914 to 1919, inclusive (the amount for 1919 being estimated), aggregates $2,323,856.22. On this basis the profit derived from the administration of the system during the six years named is $3,426,130.39. It is worthy of note that while the deposits of the system have almost quintupled during this six-year period, the expense of administration for the fiscal year 1919 will amount to only $425,000, as compared with $336,000 in the fiscal year 1914. The officers of the system have been untiring in their efforts to work out and install the most improved methods of conducting business and have effected economies wherever it was possible to do so without impairing the service or letting down any safeguard. As a result of their efforts the system has been strengthened; direct and simple methods have been substituted for cumbersome, time-consuming, and vexatious procedure. The business of the system is now efficiently and expeditiously conducted and is giving satisfaction to its patrons. The effect of the improved methods is well exemplified by a statement of the reduction in the staff at the central office of the system in Washington. On May 1, 1913, there were 176 employees in the Division of Postal Savings, and the pay roll for the fiscal year 1914 amounted to $205,528.32. On June 1, 1919, notwithstanding the fact that the deposits of the system have almost quintupled in the meantime, there were only 79 employees, at annual salaries aggregating $113,380.

Third Assistant Postmaster General.

JUNE 25, 1919.

You will find below, in tabular form, statistics showing the amount of domestic money orders issued and paid, the fees received for the issue of orders, and the yearly increase of each item for the fiscal years 1913 to 1918, inclusive:

Years.	Domestic money orders issued and paid.	Increase over preceding year.	Receipts from domestic money-order fees.	Increase over preceding year.
1913	$1,248,613,517.59	$80,918,480.69	$5,383,156.76	$415,403.92
1914	1,332,511,422.31	83,897,904.72	6,051,992.53	668,835.77
1915	1,308,925,604.45	[1] 23,585,817.86	6,054,003.32	2,010.79
1916	1,439,949,670.04	131,024,065.59	6,718,550.45	664,547.13
1917	1,628,140,977.31	188,191,307.27	7,427,716.26	709,165.81
1918	1,804,048,147.00	175,907,169.69	7,593,452.75	165,736.49

[1] Decrease.

It will be noted that there was a decrease in the amount of money-order business transacted during the fiscal year 1915, caused by conditions incident to the war, but the transactions for the succeeding years show the usual normal increase.

Among the more important of the improvements in the Postal Money Order System during the past six years is the provision for making postal money orders payable at any money-order post office within 30 days after the date of issue. The necessary congressional authority for this innovation was given in the statute approved February 6, 1914, entitled "An act to regulate the payment of postal money orders," and made effective on July 1, 1914, by your order No. 8014.

The privilege thus granted has added much to the elasticity of the postal money order, and the number of instances in which advantage is taken of it demonstrates clearly that the modification has been of great value to patrons of the service, particularly the traveling public.

A. M. DOCKERY, Third Assistant.

JULY 2, 1919.

During the eight-year period preceding the present administration, covering the administrations of Roosevelt and Taft, the deficiencies in revenues as shown by the audited reports were as follows:

1905, audited deficiency	$14,594,387.12
1906, audited deficiency	10,542,941.76
1907, audited deficiency	6,692,031.47
1908, audited deficiency	16,910,278.99
Total deficiency		$48,739,639.34
1909, audited deficiency	17,479,770.47
1910, audited deficiency	5,881,481.95
1911, audited surplus (audited statement for year shows surplus; accounts subsequently settled reduced the surplus to a deficiency of $732,301.90)	219,118.12
1912, audited deficiency	1,785,523.10
Total deficiency		24,927,657.40
Deficiency for eight-year period		73,667,296.74

The postal revenues, as audited, show surpluses in each succeeding year, except 1915, in which the receipts of the Postal Service suffered a temporary setback after the outbreak of war in Europe. A statement of surpluses and deficiency follows:

Audited surpluses by years:
1913		$4,510,650.91
1914		4,376,463.05
1916		5,829,236.07
1917		9,836,211.90
1918 (excluding $44,500,000 excess postage as war revenue)		19,626,774.08
Total surpluses		44,179,336.01
Audited deficiency, 1915 (declining receipts following outbreak of war in Europe)		11,333,308.97
Net surpluses for six-year period		32,846,027.04

Respectfully submitted.

A. M. DOCKERY,
Third Assistant Postmaster General.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, June 28, 1919.

In March, 1913, the Bureau of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General included the Division of Rural Mails, the Division of Supplies, and the Division of Dead Letters.

In cooperation with the Efficiency Commission, a complete survey of the activities of the Division of Dead Letters was inaugurated, which resulted in the immediate improvement of the sanitary conditions incident to the treatment of undelivered mail in the department. Tons of undelivered matter were disposed of forthwith. Thousands of communications received daily, upon which treatment was necessarily delayed, because of the inefficient methods involved in the examination and manipulation thereof, were more promptly acted upon, so that no letter mail remained on hand more than 24 hours. Thousands of pieces of merchandise, mailed as parcel post and lost in transit, were given immediate attention, instead of treatment after days and sometimes weeks of delay. All of this improvement was due to the use of modern mechanical devices, such as lightning letter openers and the introduction of modern office practice.

While under the supervision of the Fourth Assistant, the cost of handling undelivered mail had been reduced approximately $100,000 per annum, although a vast additional amount of fourth-class or parcel-post mail appeared for treatment.

After the preliminary improved methods had been adopted it was apparent that this function was coincident with the treatment of mailable matter in post offices, and the division, in its improved condition, was transferred to the Bureau of the First Assistant.

At about the same time the Division of Equipment, including the mail-bag repair shops and the mail-lock shops—then under the supervision of the Bureau of the Second Assistant Postmaster General—was transferred to this bureau, because it was recognized that its functions included mechanical operations and the distribution of the product thereof, a character of work similar to the receipt and distribution of supplies, as performed in the Division of Supplies.

Here, again, deplorable sanitary conditions prevailed in the workshops, concerning which health authorities had complained for years. The mail-lock shops were consolidated with the mail-bag repair shops in a building unfitted for mechanical operations, but, nevertheless, the best that could be had under the circumstances, the Government being under contract to continue the rental of the building in which the mail-bag repair shops were located at an exorbitant figure—$32,000 per annum. In this building the working conditions were such that the employees engaged in the repair of mail bags were compelled to wear dust-protecting devices, and there was continual complaint of the effect of filth and dust upon the health of the working personnel. Forthwith, such improvement as was possible in a poorly designed structure was made. Cleaning devices were installed, so that every mail container sent to the workroom for repairs had as much of the dirt and dust removed therefrom as was possible. Ventilators and fans were provided to remove whatever dust and impure air accumulated.

Nevertheless, the efficiency of operation and the continued care and precaution required to prevent disease were so burdensome that this department was compelled to call upon the office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department for an estimate for the construction of a modern shop building, which when received indicated that the building alone would cost in the neighborhood of $400,000. Whereupon the Postmaster General sought relief from the Congress, and an appropriation of $200,000 was provided with which to purchase the land and erect thereon a factory building, and to-day at the corner of Fifth and W Streets NE. there has been erected a steel and concrete manufacturing establishment second to none in the city of Washington—fireproof and sanitary, thoroughly lighted and ventilated, in which, on two shifts of eight hours each, the Post Office Department is manufacturing and repairing almost all of the mail-bag and mail-lock equipment, and also many other items of equipment, used in the Postal Service, and doing so at less cost than it had been possible to produce the same through contract with individuals, firms, or corporations, although the department operates, according to congressional enactment, strictly within an eight-hour day, usual holidays and disability leave, and no child labor, which features are not incident and therefore not expensive to the cost of operation in commercial enterprises.

The improved efficiency of the employees has warranted an increase in salary from 25 to 50 per cent since 1913, and nevertheless the cost of manufacturing and repairing sacks and pouches during the present year is less than it was during 1914.

In that year 88,184 sacks were repaired per month at a unit cost of 7.7 cents, as compared with 232,642 sacks repaired in a single month now at a unit cost of 7.4 cents. While 19,994 pouches were repaired per month in 1914 at an average unit cost of 13.4 cents, there are now approximately 14,184 pouches repaired at a unit cost of 11.2 cents, and this notwithstanding the fact that on July 1, 1919, not a single employee of the equipment section of the Division of Equipment and Supplies will receive less than $3 per day minimum wage, it being understood that this applies to the employee who has had at least one year's experience on the duties to which such employee may be assigned.

It is worthy of mention that during the year 1918, when the department was unable to secure a reasonable proposal for the manufacture of mail bags on account of conditions incident to the war, that 472,350 No. 1, class A, mail sacks were completed, at a unit cost of 18.9 cents for labor, material, and all overhead expenses, as compared with the lowest proposal tentatively submitted by a manufacturer for making this style of sack at 33.9 cents, or a saving of 15 cents per sack to the Government, an aggregate of $70,852.50 on this one small lot of mail containers alone.

Naturally, the character of mail matter has been changed, to a larger extent than is apparent to the casual observer, for with the introduction of parcel post two or three pieces of mail will fill an ordinary mail container, whereas formerly thousands of pieces of letter mail could be carried in a single mail sack. It is, therefore, obvious that a vast increase in the number of pieces of mail equipment is necessary. Through the careful selection of lighter canvas it was possible for the department to bring about large savings of money, with no loss to the serviceability of the mail-bag equipment. An instance which is typical or representative of this saving can be given with reference to the 472,350 mail sacks, mention of which is made above. These mail sacks were constructed of light-weight canvas, at a cost of $712,922.97. For the same number of sacks made out of heavy canvas it would have cost the department an additional sum of $174,769.50.

Furthermore, it was quite apparent that a vast number of mail containers are used only during the holiday season, a period of about six weeks in the months of November and December each year, and not used during the remaining 10½ months of the year. Under such conditions it was evident that a light-weight, medium-priced mail bag would be equally as servicable as the heavier, more expensive equipment. And upon this assumption thousands and thousands of dollars have been saved to the taxpayer.

While interested in the improvement in production and concerned with the increased necessity for the distribution of larger number of mail containers and the safety devices used thereon, at the same time the Postal Service was using approximately 2,400 canceling machines, which devices were designed to impress a date and cancel the postage stamps attached to mailable matter. Of this number 1,960 were rented from two or three producers who held patents upon various parts of the machines, and the rental amounted to $300,000 per annum. Proposals were submitted to the owners of these devices to purchase the same, and in accordance therewith prices for the highest grade product, ranging from $575 to $1,100, were received. Upon the expiration of the lease or rental agreements of the machines the appropriation provided for such lease or rental was used for the purchase of the machines, and to-day there is not a single canceling machine in the Postal Service leased or rented, and the cost of operation of the same number of units as were formerly in the service, at over $300,000 per annum, does not exceed $50,000, a net saving of $250,000 per year. With this sum the department is now extending the introduction of these devices to hundreds of offices that have heretofore been compelled to use the slow and inefficient hand-canceling method, and it is anticipated that in the near future every postal establishment above the fourth class will be provided with a mechanical canceling device that will improve the efficiency of operation in such offices and will be operated at an expense not to exceed $100,000 per year.

The cost system introduced since 1913 as a part of the modern shop practice in effect in the equipment branch is as accurate and complete as that in use by any enterprise anywhere, and careful inspection and criticism of the same is invited by anyone at any time.

In this division many new mechanical and labor-saving devices have been approved and perfected. A uniform rural letter box was designed. It is interesting to note that patrons of the Rural Delivery Service have expended in the neighborhood of $50,000,000 for letter boxes, and realizing that many of these devices were sold and distributed at exorbitant prices, the department designed a uniform type, and those that are now distributed to the rural patrons are all subject to the approval of the department, such approval including in addition to the material used in the same the cost or the price at which it is sold to the public. Thus, in a small way, the department endeavors to protect the patron in the quality of instrument purchased and in the reasonable cost to him of the same. Nearly 1,000,000 mail locks, lighter in weight, smaller in size, and far more efficient in service, have been designed and placed in use. Where formerly possibly more than 40,000 locks were returned annually, less than 2,000 now appear. The cost of repairs has been reduced to a nominal figure, while the cost of manufacture of each lock has been reduced from 18 cents to less than 8 cents. At the same time, to provide greater security in the transportation of mail matter, a lock cord fastener is now being experimented with which will still further reduce the cost of the construction of cord fasteners, and provide greater safety to the mailable matter within the container to which they are attached.

In 1910 the Postal Service used 84 carloads, or 2,520,000 pounds, of twine. To-day, with more than double the amount of mailable matter, including the vast increase due to the parcel post, the Postal Service consumed but 70 carloads of twine, or about 2,100,000 pounds, a net reduction in the quantity of twine consumed of nearly one-half million pounds per annum. This conservation in the use of twine followed an intensive campaign to impress upon postal employees the necessity for careful saving and reuse of every possible pound thereof.

Notwithstanding the distribution of 2,000,000 pounds of twine, as well as vastly increased quantities of necessary supplies and equipment essential to the successful operation of the Postal Service, there has been no substantial increase in the cost of such distribution, owing to the establishment of specified distributing offices where supplies and equipment are shipped in large case and freight lots, and thence distributed on short hauls to postal establishments dependent upon the central supply offices for their requirements. The economy in such a system must be apparent to everybody. The system is now in effect in 37 States and Territories and is rapidly being extended to the remaining States.

These improvements in method and increased efficiency in the detail of operation are only minor when compared with the larger field of activity in which this bureau has endeavored to serve the public on the principle that the postal administration should provide the maximum of service to the people at the minimum of expense to the taxpayer.

Since the year 1914, 4,986,079 additional patrons in rural territory who had never had adequate mail facilities are now supplied therewith, at an additional expense of but $500,000 appropriated in the year 1914, and not one single dollar since. At the same time the appropriation for increased compensation of the employees engaged in the collection and delivery of mail on rural routes has increased from $47,000,000 to $68,800,000. The number of pieces of mail handled annually has increased from 3,093,350,334 in 1913 to 3,870,068,064 in 1919, or an increase of 776,717,730 pieces. The average length of the rural routes on March 4, 1913, was 24.22 miles, while to-day they are but 25.82, or 1.6 miles longer. This is true, notwithstanding the fact that 833 routes, known as motor rural routes of 50 miles or greater in length, have been established where the use of a motor vehicle, with reasonable regularity throughout the year, is assured.

On March 4, 1913, over 2,600 petitions for the establishment and extension of rural routes had been pending for several years in the department. Nevertheless, before July 1, 1913, this number had been reduced to 834 and to-day the total number of petitions for establishment or extension of service pending in this department does not exceed 368, and not one of them has been here a period of one year.

A careful survey, based upon a report of the Bureau of the Census for 1910, disclosed that the rural population of the United States was about 52,000,000, and that, of this number, approximately 28,200,000 are domiciled on or adjacent to rural routes, 2,000,000 reside in the vicinity of star contract mail routes, and that about 13,000,000 are provided with mail facilities at third and fourth class post offices. Consequently, there are approximately 1,000,000 families in rural territory who are not provided with adequate mail service.

It has been and will continue to be the desire of this department to extend mail facilities to these pioneers of national development at reasonable cost. It is but natural that such extension would be far more expensive than the average cost of prevailing service, for in 1913 the cost of Rural Delivery Service per person was $1.97, and, notwithstanding the increase of $20,000,000 in compensation to carriers employed in this service, or approximately 50 per cent, the cost per patron had been reduced to $1.913 in 1918. However, it is certain that a vast improvement in the extension of mail facilities to a large proportion of the rural population not now provided with the same could be accomplished through the improvement of the highways and the efficient use of the same in the transportation of largely increased quantities of mailable matter.

It is evident that the successful, profitable operation of rural delivery is dependent upon the character of the highway over which the operation is performed, and this department is deeply concerned in the construction and improvement of the highways, not only because of the possible financial return and economy of operation that would be apparent, but also because it would permit the extension of mail service to all possible postal patrons. This will explain the activity and interest of the department in the improvement of the highways, for in 1913 there was available in the postal appropriation $500,000 to be expended in cooperation with the several States for experiments in the construction and improvement of highways, and through the application of this small appropriation and the further activity and interest of this department there is to-day available for the next three years the sum of $200,000,000, which will aid very materially, when a similar sum has been provided by the States for this purpose, in the extension and improvement of new and additional mail facilities to the farmer producer, who may then overcome the difference in the amount of parcel post mail matter which averages six pieces per route per day delivered into rural territory, as over against one piece per route per day transported from country to city patrons. Furthermore, through such improvement of the highways and the use thereof in the transportation of foodstuffs it would be possible to convey over good roads an average of not less than 1,800 pounds per day, as compared with the present 24 pounds conveyed per route per day, and thus the highways, the efficient use thereof, and the Postal Service may become a tremendous factor in the substantial reduction of the cost of living.

The transportation of mail in bulk from supply offices located on rail or water transportation to offices in the interior has vastly increased in the last six years, and new methods of operation were necessary to accommodate the great quantity of parcel post that appeared for conveyance. At Vernal, Utah, a bank building was wholly constructed from materials transported by parcel post. Everywhere in the West great quantities of material appeared for mailing because the postal means of communication were all that were available in the development of tremendous areas. Consequently the department organized the plan to advertise for the carriage of first and second class mail and perishable parcel post at a flat rate per annum on a fast schedule and the conveyance of third-class and ordinary parcel-post mail on a slower schedule at pound rates. This plan enabled the department to secure reasonable proposals for the service required, and effected the saving of $500,000 during the fiscal year 1915 for the Government.

During the year 1917 the department was authorized to advertise for contracts that would require the exclusive use of motor vehicles in the transportation of mail on star routes. This marked one of the most progressive advances in postal activity, for mail is not only delivered earlier than would otherwise be possible to a large number of post offices located on branch railroad lines but to offices from which rural routes emanated, and thus the mail from cities is delivered 24 to 48 hours earlier than formerly, with corresponding advantages in the dispatch of outgoing mail.

Within the last few years many advertisements for service on star routes required the contractor to make box delivery and collection service, sell stamps, and provide money-order and registry facilities to patrons domiciled on the roads covered by the routes. These additional facilities have been provided at no substantial increased expense, and have resulted in convenience to thousands of patrons, almost all of whom are remote from other postal conveniences.

A new function known as village delivery has been authorized since 1913, and at the close of that year 101 post offices had been supplied with this apparently desirable service. A total of 126 carriers were employed at an average annual compensation of $625 each. On July 1, 1919, the service will be in operation at 570 offices, with 832 carriers employed at an average annual compensation of $783 each. The entire departmental office force used to establish and conduct this service consists of one clerk and a stenographer.

This bureau believes that its record for accomplishment warrants the privilege of administrative discretion in the establishment of rural routes from 36 miles in length to 50 miles in length where at present it is impossible, on account of legislative restrictions, to provide routes of that length. The motor vehicle has revolutionized the means of conveyance everywhere, and its value should not be curtailed in its application to problems of transportation in the Postal Service any more than it is in its usefulness in the commercial world.

JAS. I. BLAKSLEE, Fourth Assistant.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON] for 20 minutes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, immediately following the adjournment of Congress I spent several weeks in France, Belgium, and Germany going over the war-swept areas of France and Belgium. It was my privilege to visit the battle fields, including the area around Chateau-Thierry, including a little wood near there known as Belleau Wood, made forever famous by the valiant fighting of the Fifth and Sixth Marine Regiments. I followed the pathway of the glorious Rainbow Division, representing, as it did, 26 of the States of our Union, including a Minnesota regiment—the One hundred and fifty-first Field Artillery. I saw where it pounded its way through the German lines into the St. Mihiel salient. Then I traveled through the scene of the great Meuse-Argonne conflict, the greatest of American battles, where over 26,000 American soldiers paid the last supreme measure of devotion and countless other thousands added new luster to American arms.

Among these valiant men in these various conflicts were many young men from my own city—the city of Minneapolis. Early in the spring of 1917 the high schools and the State University in my city furnished 600 of their young men, eager to be the "first to fight." They joined the Marine Corps. Others joined our efficient National Guard regiments or went into the Regular Army, while still more, accepting their country's call, went in to swell the ranks of the great National Army. Here and there I visited the battle-field cemeteries where rested the fallen.

On my return, in speaking before the Marine Fathers' Association of Minneapolis, telling them somewhat of my experiences, at the close of my talk I was asked, as a Member of Congress, to use my best efforts to find out who was responsible for the consideration, sympathy, and undue favor shown to so-called conscientious objectors. The one making the request had a son in the service. He voiced the sentiments of not only every father and mother there present but of every parent whose son had willingly responded to the call of country. He also voiced the sentiments of numerous men in the service who could not understand the policy of the Government toward the man who would not fight.

From the fall of 1917 until the present time everyone has known that numerous conscienceless objectors, consisting of pro-Germans, I. W. W., political Socialists, and cowardly slackers, were being exempted from all military service; that they were being shown special consideration in the camps, and were not being held to obey military law or to submit to military discipline. These were not mere idle rumors, for practically everyone with friends in the various camps knew these conditions to be true. There was in the minds of many a pressing inquiry as to who was responsible. Was it Congress? No; it was not Congress. The selective-service law, passed on May 18, 1917, contained this provision:

(i) Any person who is found by such local board to be a member of any well-recognized religious sect or organization organized and existing May 18, 1917, and whose then existing creed or principles forbid its members to participate in war in any form, and whose religious convictions are against war or participation therein in accordance with the creed or principles of said religious organization.—Any such person upon presentation to such local board at any time within 10 days after the filing of a claim for discharge by or in respect of such person, of an affidavit made by such person stating that he is a member in good faith and in good standing of a well-recognized religious sect or organization (giving the name thereof) organized and existing May 18, 1917, and whose then existing creed or principles forbid its members to participate in war in any form, and that his religious convictions are against war or participation therein in accordance with the creed or principles of said religious organization. And upon the presentation to such local board of an affidavit made by the clerk or minister of the well-recognized religious sect or organization to which such person claiming exemption is a member, stating that said person is a member of said religious sect or organization, which was well recognized and was organized and existing May 18, 1917, and that the then existing creed or principles of said religious sect or organization forbid its members to participate in war in any form; and upon presentation by affidavits of such other evidence as may be required in the opinion of the local board to substantiate the claim of any such person.

Said act of Congress provides, section 3:

But no person so exempted shall be exempted from service in any capacity that the President shall declare to be noncombatant.

In case any such person substantiates, in the opinion of the local board, his claim, such local board shall issue a certificate stating that such person shall not be required or compelled to serve in any capacity except in some capacity declared by the President to be noncombatant.

Note, to be exempt from combatant service he must personally have religious convictions against war. Those convictions must be in accordance with the then existing creed of a religious organization and of which he must have been a member. Failing in any one of these particulars, exemption could not be given. The individual with mere conscientious scruples against war was not exempt. The individual with conscientious religious scruples against war must serve. The only exemption was to a member of a religious organization with an existing creed against war which he believed in and subscribed to, and even in that event persons were exempt from combatant service only. Congress in that way tried to prevent the law from exempting only those who by long religious training and association had conscientious convictions against war.

This remained the law throughout the war. The exemption proviso framed by Congress did not include the pro-German, the I. W. W., the political Socialist, or cowardly slacker. This was the expression of Congress upon the subject.

Congress, then, was not responsible. Was it the draft boards? No.

The selective-service regulations further safeguarded the law by providing for the filing of affidavits with the draft board and the issuance by the board of a certificate exempting the person certified thereon from combatant service only. The draftee had to report at the camp and await his assignment by military authorities to noncombatant service. On the whole, the draft boards conscientiously carried out the law and the regulations to the very letter. In my district and, as I am advised, throughout the country they were made up of patriotic, high-grade men, who performed their duties well.

My investigation disclosed that the responsiblity was not with Congress nor with the draft boards, but rested entirely upon the War Department. I propose now to demonstrate this by documentary evidence of the department itself.

First. The Secretary of War issued his order setting aside the selective-draft act relating to conscientious objectors and enlarging the exemption clause, thereby permitting the I. W. W., the pro-German, the political Socialist, and cowardly slacker to evade military service, both combatant and noncombatant.

Second. The War Department, through the Secretary, supplied information to and cooperated with an organization formed to enable men to evade the draft.

Third. It issued orders to the various cantonment commanders kindly, considerately, and specially to treat and deal with the so-called conscientious objectors, going so far as to engage sympathetic men to travel about the country at the expense of the Government to see to it that such treatment was in fact accorded.

Fourth. These orders were issued covertly, accompanied by instructions enjoining secrecy.

As to the first proposition: On December 10, 1917, the Secretary issued his order directing "that personal scruples against war" should be considered as constituting "conscientious objections."

Note carefully the language of the order given:

[Confidential.]

DECEMBER 19, 1917.

From: The Adjutant General of the Army.
To: The commanding generals of all National Army and National Guard camps except Camp Grant.
Subject: Conscientious objectors.

1. The Secretary of War directs that until further instructions on the subject are issued "personal scruples against war" should be considered as constituting "conscientious objections" and such persons should be treated in the same manner as other "conscientious objectors" under the instructions contained in confidential letter from this office dated October 10, 1917.

2. Under no circumstances should these instructions be communicated to the newspapers.

H. G. LEARNARD,
Adjutant General.

Here was a deliberate change and enlargement of the exemption proviso in palpable violation of law and by the exercise of authority which the Secretary did not possess. What right had the Secretary of War to legislate? What power did he possess to amend an act of Congress? Under the term "personal scruples" the I. W. W., pro-German, political Socialist, and cowardly slacker sought and obtained exemption. The I. W. W. could qualify thereunder, for he had scruples against war and certainly they were personal. The pro-German could qualify, for personally he loved Germany better than America, and he had scruples against waging war against Germany. His reasons were personal. The same would apply to certain political Socialists and slackers seeking exemption. Their reasons also were "personal" and they "scrupled" against making war on behalf of any country, many of them despising the institutions of their own country. This change was made advisedly. I call attention to the memorandum of the Secretary of War to the General Staff bearing date December 8, 1918:

The so-called conscientious objectors present a novel problem in military administration. To some extent the novelty and difficulty of this problem was recognized by the Congress, which made express provision for a part of the general class. However, when the law came to be administered it was found that only certain varieties of religious experience had been adequately provided for, and that other varieties of religious obligation and the whole class of conscientious objection based upon ethical considerations and not directly associated with formal religious beliefs was unprovided for. The President, as Commander in Chief of the Army, thereupon laid down a definite policy for the administration of the law, and the discipline of those called to the service who were affected by any of these forms of conscientious objection not specifically included within the limits of the statute.

This order constitutes a perversion of the Federal statute. Congress did not make provision for a part only of a general class, but in accurate and certain terms defined the class of persons to be considered conscientious objectors. And by careful reservations and restrictions eliminated the very persons included in the Secretary's order. In other words, the Secretary of War, as the administrative officer, did not confine himself to an application of the act of Congress, but treated the act as an elastic thing to be stretched by him to cover such persons as in his judgment should have been included by the Congress.

One variety of conscientious objector was not enough for the Secretary of War. He would add thereto; he would change and amend the act of Congress so as to include Heinz's 57 varieties of conscientious objectors. Thus what was made certain by law was made uncertain by executive mandate. The observation of the Secretary that Congress did not make "provision for" is literally accurate, but it did make provision against the hypocritical slacker who sought to evade military service.

As to the substantiation of the charge that the War Department supplied information to and cooperated with the enemies of the selective-service law, I quote from the letter of May 19, 1918, of the Third Assistant Secretary of War, Mr. Keppel, to the director of the Civil Liberties Bureau, the material portion of which is as follows:

I have had a talk with the Secretary of War with reference to the question which you raised, and I have also consulted some of his military associates, and we have all come to the conclusion that under the circumstances it would not be in the public interest for us to continue to supply information pursuant to your request or otherwise to cooperate in any way with the Civil Liberties Bureau.

In other words, the War Department admits "cooperating with" and having supplied "information to" a bureau whose leader was later convicted of attempting to get others to evade the draft. They admit supplying this information. [Applause.] They admit cooperating with this bureau. The Military Intelligence Division of their own department had knowledge of this information, with which knowledge the entire department must be charged.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Arizona?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I do.

Mr. HAYDEN. The gentleman has just read a quotation from Assistant Secretary Keppel. I wish he would read the rest of the statement, which I have before me.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I have only a part of the letter. I have no objection to adding the other part. I was going to cover it in another portion of my address.

Mr. HAYDEN. He says:

At the present time the activities of this bureau——

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I prefer not to yield for more than a question. I will read the balance of the statement, as follows:

I have before me a memorandum from the Military Intelligence Bureau which gives in detail evidence of the activities of the bureau which seem to justify this decision and of which I had not previously known.

A Roger Baldwin was one of the leading spirits in this so-called liberty bureau. Mr. Baldwin is now serving time for obstructing the draft. He was a so-called conscientious objector and espoused the cause of all so-called conscientious objectors, and for his conduct in so doing he was tried, convicted, and sentenced to a year in prison, and while in prison he so badly conducted himself that he had to be transferred to another place and must serve the full length of his sentence without any deduction for good behavior. And yet our Secretary of War "cooperated" with this man and the bureau with which he was identified and supplied Baldwin and the bureau with information, and that information was such that finally out of deference to public sentiment they were compelled to discontinue it.

It will not do to offer as an excuse that the department withdrew its cooperation when it ascertained the character of the organization. It was its imperative duty not to disclose valuable military information or to give assistance to any organization until it did know and know definitely that it was worthy of such aid and assistance.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Five minutes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I am afraid I can not yield.

Mr. BEE. I want to ask the gentleman one question in that connection.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I may have time at the close of my remarks, and if so I will be very glad to yield.

As to the third proposition, I quote from the following order of the Secretary of War commanding that kindly and special consideration be given these men:

[Confidential.]

EXHIBIT G.

OCTOBER 10, 1917.

From: The Adjutant General of the Army.
To: The commanding generals of all National Army and National Guard division camps.
Subject: Conscientious objectors.

1. The Secretary of War directs that you be instructed to segregate the conscientious objectors in their divisions and to place them under supervision of instructors who shall be specially selected with a view of insuring that these men will be handled with tact and consideration and that their questions will be answered fully and frankly.

2. With reference to their attitude of objecting to military service these men are not to be treated as violating military laws, thereby subjecting themselves to the penalties of the Articles of War, but their attitude in this respect will be quietly ignored and they will be treated with kindly consideration. Attention in this connection is invited to a case where a number of conscientious objectors in one of our divisions, when treated in this manner, renounced their original objections to military service and voluntarily offered to give their best efforts to the service of the United States as soldiers.

3. It is desired that after the procedure above indicated shall have been followed for a sufficient length of time to afford opportunity to judge of the results derived from it, a report of the action taken and the results obtained under these instructions be submitted to the War Department by each division commander. As a result of the consideration of all these reports further instructions will be issued by the Secretary of War as to the policy to be observed in future in the case of conscientious objectors.

4. Under no circumstances are the instructions contained in the foregoing to be given to the newspapers.

H. G. LEARNARD,
Adjutant General.

This order needs no comment.

I quote further from the letter of the Secretary of War bearing date of June 1, 1918:

If, however, any drafted man, upon his arrival at camp, either through the presentation of a certificate from his local board or by written statement addressed by himself to the commanding officer, shall record himself as a conscientious objector, he shall not, against his will, be required to wear a uniform or to bear arms; nor if, pending the final decision as to his status, he shall decline to perform, under military direction, duties which he states to be contrary to the dictates of his conscience, shall he receive punitive treatment for such conduct.

Is it not extending undue consideration, is it not disgusting coddling, to permit a soldier to fix his status in the Army by an unsworn statement that "I object"?

Even this was insufficient for this zealous and sympathetic friend of the so-called conscientious objector. Following the issuance of these orders a special board, consisting of a military officer and two civilians, was appointed to visit the camps and to see that this special consideration was being uniformly given these men. Moreover, in violation of the letter and spirit of the law, men who refused noncombatant service were furloughed to work on the farm; and for fear that the farmer would mistreat this citizen, additional help was employed for the purpose of protecting this governmental favorite against the farmer's exploitation. I quote from a letter of the Third Assistant Secretary of War to the Secretary of War, bearing date June 13, 1919:

In placing men that enjoy the cooperation of the Department of Agriculture we engage a special commissioner to look after the details of their assignment and to see, on the one hand, that they perform their duty efficiently, and, on the other hand, that they are not exploited.

Would that the department had shown one part of the consideration for the fighting men who unwittingly transgressed military laws and regulations that they did for the so-called conscientious objector! [Applause.]

Would an unsworn statement bearing upon punishment proposed to be inflicted upon a real soldier—a fighting man—have established a controlling fact to his advantage? If recent disclosures as to the administration of military justice are to be believed, his sworn statement received only too scant and too meager consideration.

As to the fourth proposition, that of secrecy, you will note that the letters concluded with this significant language:

Under no circumstances should these instructions be given to the newspapers.

I wonder if this injunction against letting the people know what was transpiring was prompted by fear of public condemnation and disapproval.

What was the result of this course of catering and coddling? Maj. Frank S. White, jr., camp judge advocate at Camp Funston, a resident of Birmingham, Ala., in a public interview, said:

Camp Funston was selected as a dumping ground for the segregation of a large number of these so-called conscientious objectors. The military authorities had no trouble whatever in dealing with those having religious scruples against engaging in combatant service. They all readily accepted such noncombatant service as was assigned to them.

There was, however, a large number of alleged conscientious objectors, who, when selected under the draft act, made no claim that they had religious scruples against fighting, but pretended to have conscientious objections based upon the view of the obligations which they owed to the country.

MOSTLY FOREIGN RADICALS.

They were composed in the main of German, Austrian, Russian Socialists, and I. W. W., who openly denied the right of the United States to induct them into the military service, some of whom had endeavored to get commissions in the Army and after having failed to do so, when drafted, conveniently found themselves opposed to engaging in military service, and then, when ordered to perform noncombatant duty, openly declared that they owed this country no duty, refused to obey any order from a military source, thereby defying the military arm of the Government.

These men had conspired together and refused to obey the lawful commands of a superior officer to wear the uniform of the United States Army or to take a rake and rake up hay and load it on a wagon; or to police up around their own quarters. Charges had been preferred against them for violation of the sixty-fourth article of war, and they were in confinement in the provost guardhouse awaiting trial or result of trial by general court-martial.

DID NOT BELIEVE IN DEITY.

The selective-service law exempted from combatant service all persons who because of religious belief claimed exemption from military service, but no person so exempted from combatant service was exempted from noncombatant service. These men did not come within the purview of the act affording exemption from military service to sincere, religious objectors. They were admittedly Socialists and proven to be pro-Germans, who did not believe in Deity, and whose aim was to spread insidious and treasonable propaganda throughout this country, and were actually caught in disseminating it in this military camp, which was subversive of all discipline and destructive of the morale of our Army.

The act referred to was never intended, as the War Department interpreted it, to extend exemption to men such as those, who were nothing less than slackers and cowards or pro-Germans. If men of this character were not dealt with promptly and vigorously the whole principle of universal service would fall to the ground. These simulated objectors were confined with a large number of general prisoners and with these other prisoners, under military custom, were required to police their quarters and around their premises. This they openly and defiantly refused to do, throwing their share of the work upon the other prisoners, dissatisfying them, and setting before these other prisoners this example of disobedience and defiance of authority.

ENCOURAGED FROM OUTSIDE.

They would even refuse to march in orderly formation to and from their mess, but would straggle along as they saw fit, and when being ordered out to mess or exercise they would stand in the doorway and block it so that the guards or other persons could not pass, defying the guards and officers to move them; they refused to take exercise, baths, and keep their bodies and belongings clean and in a sanitary condition; they refused to be vaccinated or inoculated in order to safeguard themselves as well as their fellow soldiers from sickness and disease. In fact, they refused to obey and apparently took pleasure in letting it be known that they would take no part under the Military Establishment nor obey any military command whatever. In their attitude they repeatedly let it be known that they were receiving encouragement from outside sources and claiming they would be protected in their attitude by the War Department.

To illustrate their recalcitrant attitude, if the meals which were provided for them and other prisoners did not suit them they would engage in throwing the dishes, camp stools, and their mess kits around the mess hall, acting in the most mutinous and disorderly manner. When ordered to stand at attention by officers engaged in inspection duty, they would refuse to assume a proper position; in order to provoke these officers they would defiantly put their feet as far apart as possible and make grimaces at them, asking them what they were going to do about it.

In brief, Maj. White claims that as a result of the law as amended by the Secretary of War the camps were infested with I. W. W., German sympathizers, and craven cowards—men who would not fight nor even obey mere police and health regulations of the camp.

The above attitude and the acts connected therewith were the acts of the Secretary of War; but, in addition to that, by reason of the position he occupied and the fact that his attitude in this matter was known to the President, they were also the acts of the President of the United States. For in a letter to the President bearing date July 2, 1918, the Secretary of War informed the Commander in Chief that—

We are now doing all that public opinion will stand in the interest of conscientious objectors and others whose views do not happen to coincide with those of the vast majority of their fellow countrymen.

Yes, indeed; they were doing far more than public opinion would have stood for.

Is it any wonder that the camp officers were warned not to disclose the situation to the newspapers?

Further in a letter of March 23, 1918, the President——

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield? What letter of the President does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I refer to an Executive order.

Mr. AYRES. Has the gentleman that order?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I have. [Applause.]

Mr. AYRES. Very well. Let us hear it.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I now quote from an Executive order of the President issued on March 23, 1918:

2. Persons ordered to report for military service under the above act who have (a) been certified by their local boards to be members of a religious sect or organization as defined in section 4 of said act; or (b) who object to participating in war because of conscientious scruples but have failed to receive certificates as members of a religious sect or organization from their local board, will be assigned to noncombatant military service as defined in paragraph 1 to the extent that such persons are able to accept service as aforesaid without violation of the religious or other conscientious scruples by them in good faith entertained. Upon the promulgation of this order it shall be the duty of each division, camp, or post commander, through a tactful and considerate officer, to present to all such persons the provisions hereof with adequate explanation of the character of noncombatant service herein defined, and upon such explanations to secure acceptances of assignment to the several kinds of noncombatant service above enumerated; and whenever any person is assigned to noncombatant service by reason of his religious or other conscientious scruples, he shall be given a certificate stating the assignment and reason therefor, and such certificate shall thereafter be respected as preventing the transfer of such persons from such noncombatant to combatant service by any division, camp, post, or other commander under whom said person may thereafter be called to serve, but such certificate shall not prevent the assignment of such person to some other form of noncombatant service with his own consent. So far as may be found feasible by each division, camp, or post commander, future assignments of such persons to noncombatant military service will be restricted to the several detachments and units of the medical department in the absence of a request for assignment to some other branch of noncombatant service as defined in paragraph 1 hereof.

[Applause.]

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. AYRES. Is not that the law that Congress passed?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. It is not. May I have five minutes more, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The time is in the control of the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. NOLAN. My time has been parceled out.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] has 10 minutes remaining and the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] has 25 minutes remaining.

Mr. UPSHAW. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I have no time left, unless I am granted more time.

Mr. NOLAN. I have 35 minutes, Mr. Speaker, and I have no time to grant.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will yield the 10 minutes on this side to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

Mr. HAYDEN. I shall yield three minutes to the gentleman if he will answer my questions.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. That will depend on the questions.

Mr. HAYDEN. I shall yield to the gentleman three minutes of my time or I will take the floor in my own time and ask the gentleman a few questions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair assumes that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed, not upon the bill before the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, it will be noted that the President after the congressional definition of conscientious objector inserts the following:

Or who objects to participating in war because of conscientious scruples.

And later on uses the expression "religious or other conscientious scruples."

The only change from the words of his Secretary is that the President uses the term "conscientious scruples" whereas the Secretary uses the term "personal scruples." Both refer to other than religious conscientious objectors. By this Executive order an act of Congress was deliberately amended and enlarged, not in furtherance of the legislative will but in direct conflict therewith. Under the proviso as changed by the Secretary of War and by the President anyone religious or atheistic, believer in a creed or disbeliever, organizationist or individual, a person with convictions against war in existence when war broke out or a person who had conceived these convictions while on his way to the draft board, were brought within this peculiar exemption.

Under the Constitution it is the duty of Congress to raise armies. In raising the Army to wage war against Germany they laid down the principle that in a country where there was equality of opportunity there was a corresponding duty upon our citizens to serve that country and to defend it against enemies, both foreign and domestic, but recognizing that there were a few individuals belonging to certain religious organizations who had subscribed to certain creeds in good faith and had conscientious convictions against shooting their fellow men even in time of war. In deference to such individuals they were exempted from service as combatants, but were expressly directed that notwithstanding these convictions they must serve in a noncombatant capacity.

Congress had determined what constituted a conscientious objector and by implication what did not. Yet the Secretary of War and the President assumed the authority to make addition to the terms "personal scruples" and "conscientious scruples" and to apply perhaps the rule of self-determination and to permit the individual to decide for himself whether or not he would serve his country. In that connection I quote from the letter of the Third Assistant Secretary of War, bearing date September 28, 1918:

To the COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC INFORMATION:

It has been the liberal American policy of according a measure of self-determination to the few who in all sincerity have not been able to adjust their minds to the needs of this sudden and desperate emergency.

There can be but one answer to the oft-repeated question as to responsibility for the policy pursued in reference to the conscientious objector. That responsibility rests upon the Secretary of War and the President of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. HAYDEN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Minnesota if he has carefully read the statement concerning the treatment of conscientious objectors in the Army, issued by the War Department on June 18, 1919?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I have.

Mr. HAYDEN. In that statement, from which the gentleman quoted a part relative to the relations between the Third Assistant Secretary of War, Mr. Keppel, and the so-called Civil Liberties Bureau, is a letter in which the statement is made that the War Department would have nothing further to do with that bureau.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. HAYDEN. The reason for that statement was, as I am reliably informed, that at the beginning of the activities of this self-constituted Civil Liberties Bureau the War Department was not aware of the character of the work that the men who controlled it were carrying on. After having discovered the pernicious nature of their activities, as exposed by the Military Intelligence Service, under date of September 11, 1918, this letter was written by the Third Assistant Secretary of War to the chairman and directors of the Civil Liberties Bureau:

You and Baldwin—

That is the same Baldwin to whom the gentleman from Minnesota referred—are aware of the position of the department with reference to dealing with the National Civil Liberties Bureau. When you two and Mr. Codman called upon the Secretary and were referred to me you called as individuals and were assured that the matters to which you referred would have careful attention. They have had, and are having such attention. I can only repeat to you personally what I told you then, that in my judgment the activities of the Civil Liberties Bureau as such at the present time are a distinct hindrance and in no way a help in carrying these matters to a satisfactory conclusion.

This is the letter, printed on the same page of the statement of the War Department from which the gentleman from Minnesota obtained the first reference to the Civil Liberties Bureau which he read, but which he did not see fit to also read to the House.

And it was for the reasons given in Mr. Keppel's letter that the War Department refused to have anything further to do with the Civil Liberties Bureau. [Applause.]

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman deny, then, that they did furnish information to this bureau and that they did cooperate with this bureau?

Mr. HAYDEN. Just as the War Department would deal with any other individual in the United States who asked for information, and the department did so until the Secretary of War ascertained the harmful character of their work. Then he promptly and properly declined to furnish them any further information.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman affirm that it was not the business of the War Department first to find out what this bureau was about before they furnished them information and cooperated with them? [Applause.]

Mr. HAYDEN. It was not the province of the War Department to presume that any group of American citizens were disloyal until some proof was presented to that effect. When the Military Intelligence Service submitted evidence that the Civil Liberties Bureau was obstructing the operations of the draft law the Secretary of War at once acted to prevent the officers of that bureau from obtaining any further information from his department. The letter that the gentleman has read and the letter that I have read both demonstrate the truth of what I have said.

When complaint was made to the War Department that conscientious objectors were not receiving proper consideration in the camps, when the charge was made that they were receiving brutal treatment, when such complaints and charges, whether true or not, were brought to the attention of the War Department, it was the duty of the Secretary, of course, to find out the facts and advise the party complaining of the result of the investigations. This so-called Civil Liberties Bureau organized itself for that purpose; its ostensible object was to see that no citizen was unlawfully deprived of his civil rights. At the beginning those who formed this organization seemed to be acting on the square and not attempting to interfere with the draft law. The department at first cooperated with them; but as soon as the Secretary discovered the real nature of their efforts this relation at once ceased.

The gentleman from Minnesota also pointed out the fact that a certain order of the War Department directed the various camp commanders not to give newspaper publicity to the instructions contained therein that conscientious objectors should be segregated and treated with tact and consideration. The Secretary of War then had in mind the appointment of a commission whose duty it would be to visit all of the Army camps in the United States and to investigate the sincerity of the claims of all conscientious objectors. The reason for that injunction against publicity was not to protect the objectors but to protect the Army.

If the War Department had widely advertised the order directing the segregation of conscientious objectors and their humane treatment and had publicly announced that a commission was to be appointed to visit the various camps and ascertain whether such objectors were sincere, the result would have been that many drafted men who were seeking an excuse to evade military service would have claimed exemption on the ground of conscientious objection to war. It would have been nothing more than an invitation to slackers and cowards to declare themselves. In order to avoid that very thing, to keep that information from those who had no stomach for the war, the Secretary directed that no newspaper publicity be given. [Applause.] That was but common sense. Such secrecy could be of no possible advantage to the conscientious objectors. Why the War Department should be criticized for so wise a policy is beyond my understanding.

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. TINCHER. Does the gentleman contend that the Secretary of War did not go beyond the act of Congress in extending the meaning of the words "conscientious objector"?

Mr. HAYDEN. The President of the United States as the Commander in Chief had an undoubted right to say what should be done with any soldier in the Army. If any drafted individual claimed exemption on the ground that he did not believe in war, that it was against his concept of religion, the President, acting through the Secretary of War, had the right to deal with him in a just and humane manner. In carrying out the policy of testing the sincerity of individual conscientious objectors who were not members of any well-recognized religious sect the Secretary of War acted clearly within the authority granted him by law.

Mr. TINCHER. Then what was the use of defining a conscientious objector in the law?

Mr. CONNALLY. Is it not a fact that the question was whether a conscientious objector was absolutely exempt from the draft, whereas the regulation made by the Secretary of War was not an exemption from the draft but to determine the character of the service?

Mr. HAYDEN. No; under the selective-draft law it was a question whether he was a member of a well-recognized religious sect whose creed forbid its members to participate in war; and if so, he could not be compelled to do combatant service. Actual experience demonstrated that there were a number of sincerely religious men who were not members of a recognized church and yet were undoubtedly conscientious in their opposition to war. If the religious convictions of such a man who claimed his spiritual authority from the divine command "Thou shalt not kill" were found to be honest and sincere, why should he not receive the same treatment as the member of a recognized sect? In my opinion the Secretary of War did right by giving such religious fanatics the same treatment as was granted to other conscientious objectors.

In this report which I hold in my hand, submitted by the Secretary of War on June 18, 1919, the whole question of the treatment of conscientious objectors is discussed in great detail. Every law, every order, every regulation, everything that was done, all the statistics relating to conscientious objectors are to be found in this report. The report shows that there were 64,693 claims for noncombatant classification, of which 56,830 were recognized as valid by the local boards. Of the last number, 20,873 were actually inducted into service, every one of whom went to the cantonments with a certificate in his pocket that he should be recognized as a sincere conscientious objector and not compelled to do any actual fighting. But when these men arrived in camp and learned what the war was about, learned what patriotism really meant, when they saw thousands of others cheerfully preparing themselves to perform their highest duty, four-fifths of them forgot their religious or other fanatical notions and became willing soldiers ready for any service. The actual figures are that but 3,989, or less than one out of every five, made any claim in camp for exemption from any form of military service.

The board of inquiry appointed by the Secretary of War to investigate the sincerity of conscientious objectors, therefore, had a little less than 4,000 cases to consider. That board consisted of Maj. Richard C. Stoddard, of the Judge Advocate General's office, Julian W. Mack, a Federal judge, and H. F. Stone, dean of the Columbia University Law School. This board of inquiry gave every conscientious objector that appeared before it a fair hearing, with the result that many of them changed their minds and accepted service. The final result was that but 504 men had to be court-martialed, so that the martyr crop was small.

It is a remarkable fact that without any direct knowledge of what the other country was doing both England and the United States finally evolved practically the same method of dealing with conscientious objectors. England drafted a larger number of men into her army than did the United States, and there were 6,135 conscientious objectors in that country who refused to perform combatant service. The British military authorities promptly tried 5,596 of these by court-martial, many tales of severe and brutual treatment were told, with the result that Parliament appointed a committee, headed by Mr. Brice, undersecretary of the Home Office, to investigate conditions. This committee proceeded to test out the sincerity of the objectors. Four thousand six hundred and forty-six were found to be sincere in their convictions, leaving but 950, who were punished by confinement in prison as recalcitrants.

But little blame can attach to a patriotic soldier when he sees another man who has been called to the colors deliberately refuse to perform his full duty as a soldier. Resentment was bound to arise which would not take time to ask questions or discuss religious beliefs. His first instinct was to compel obedience by force. Wisdom therefore directed that wherever conscientious objectors were found to be sincere in their convictions the military duty which such persons should be required to perform should be determined by a civilian tribunal and not by the military authorities. England and the United States each reached the same conclusion in this matter, and both countries solved the problem in the same way.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to my good friend from Oklahoma.

Mr. CARTER. I have not much sympathy with the conscientious objectors.

Mr. HAYDEN. Neither have I; particularly with the anarchists, socialists, I. W. W.'s, and pro-Germans who were against this war.

Mr. CARTER. But was not one of the greatest soldiers, one of the greatest fighters that we had in the war, a conscientious objector?

Mr. HAYDEN. The gentleman refers to Sergt. Alvin York, who was given a certificate by his local board that he was a member of a church whose tenets were opposed to war. Sergt. York never presented that certificate to the military authorities, but went into the Army without objection and made a magnificent fighting record.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. With pleasure.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Do I understand the gentleman and that side of the House to defend the position of the Secretary of War and the President of the United States in reference to the policy pursued toward the so-called conscientious objectors?

Mr. HAYDEN. I certainly do. The War Department acted wisely and well in handling a most difficult problem, which was unprecedented in this country, because our Government had never before attempted to draft into service nearly 3,000,000 men, many of them against their will. If brutal treatment had been handed out to these individual conscientious objectors, if they had been turned over to the military authorities and forced to do combatant service when they had a firm religious conviction against it, the Secretary of War would have made martyrs by the hundreds. Such a policy would have created popular sympathy for these objectors, there would have been a reaction in their favor, and Congress would have been compelled to take action in their behalf, just as the British Parliament did when the Brice committee was appointed.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Was not Sergt. York a really red-blooded American and not in the class of these yellow slackers the gentleman has referred to?

Mr. HAYDEN. I classify Sergt. York with thousands of other good men who went away from their local boards with certificates of conscientious objection, but who soon saw that if America was to live Germany must be defeated.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. At least Sergt. York fought while these other fellows shirked.

Mr. HAYDEN. He and a great many other men who possessed certificates that they were entitled to exemption from combatant service went to Europe and fought the Hun to the finish.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And I take off my hat to Sergt. York.

Mr. HAYDEN. And so do I; he has justly earned the high respect of every true American.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman ought not to classify him with these other fellows.

Mr. HAYDEN. I do not. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me express the hope that the special committee now investigating the conduct of the war against Germany will take early opportunity to thoroughly and impartially examine into the facts relative to the treatment of conscientious objectors in the Army. The American people are entitled to know the truth, and when the whole truth is made known I am satisfied that the verdict will be that the President of the United States and the Secretary of War do not deserve the censure of those who do not know, or do not want to know, the truth. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Arizona has expired.

By unanimous consent Mr. HAYDEN was granted leave to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], and I ask unanimous consent that he may be permitted to speak out of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California yields 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], and asks unanimous consent that he may be permitted to speak out of order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter that I have written to a constituent upon his appeal for clemency in behalf of conscientious objectors. I believe it to be relevant to the subject matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

Owing to the number of letters which he has received urging his cooperation in securing the release of conscientious objectors now in confinement in the United States, Congressman ANTHONY J. GRIFFIN is of the opinion that a systematically planned propaganda is in progress.

To the letter of Mr. William L. Palmer, 453 East One hundred and sixtieth Street, which is a fair sample of the letters received, the Congressman has sent the following reply:

"DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 1st instant, expressing your solicitude for the 'immediate release of conscientious objectors' duly received. I can not join you in your anxiety, nor can I agree with you that 'it is reasonable to assume that if everyone took the position these men have taken there could be no more war.' Such a hypothesis is preposterous.

"It is utterly unthinkable that 'everyone' is likely to take the position of hostility to war. Such a possibility is only realizable in the millenium, which is still quite far distant.

BURDEN ON OTHER MAN SELFISH.

"In our present age even the most peaceably inclined must recognize the necessity for self-defense so long as powerful nations persist in huge armaments and gigantic preparations for possible aggressions upon their weaker neighbors. For any man to take the stand that the defense of his home and country should fall upon the shoulders of others, while he is permitted to pursue his usual vocation without contributing his share to the common welfare, is the most dastardly and dangerous form of egotism and selfishness.

"Such men are a menace to the land they live in, and to discharge them now, with bouquets and compliments, after 4,000,000 of the loyal and patriotic sons of America have faithfully performed their duty—200,000 of them offering up their lives—would be an unforgivable injustice.

"Your statement that 'these men have committed no crime, for it has never been established that refusing to take life is a crime,' is a quaint but nevertheless dangerous combination of sophistry and moral blindness. On the contrary, these men committed the greatest crime in the whole category of human offenses. They refused to defend their country. The latter part of your statement, that 'it has never been established that refusing to take life is a crime,' conceals the most dangerous sophistry in that it flies to the Ten Commandments for the defense of cowardice, and outvies the devil in quoting Scripture. Even the most pious and loyal of devotees of the Scriptures have never claimed that the moral law was broken by taking life to defend life. The law of self-defense is well established. No one but a coward or a crank can justly claim that he shows his devotion to religion by refusing to help prevent the destruction of his fellow citizens by a foreign power or the impairment of his country's rights and liberties.

"Yours, very truly, "ANTHONY J. GRIFFIN."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House to certain remarks made in the Senate on Friday last. I refer to pages 2811 and 2814. There was a discussion in the Senate, and the result would indicate they sought to blame the House of Representatives for the present condition of the Air Service. After complaining of the present condition in the Air Service, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs in the Senate, when Senator FALL remarked that the department was not to be blamed for the conditions in the Air Service, said:

I interject the observation that it can hardly be said that it is the fault of the Senate.

Whereupon the papers throughout the country in editorials blamed the House of Representatives for the condition in the Air Service, owing to the cut in the appropriation. With all due respect to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, I am sure that if he blames the House Appropriations Committee for the present condition——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from New York in proceeding to criticize another body is out of order.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am not criticizing another body. I am justifying the judgment of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas). The gentleman will proceed without reference to the action taken in another body.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I wish to point out that the House appropriated $25,000,000 for the Air Service for the year 1919–20 and $25,000,000 for the Air Service of the Navy. That makes $50,000,000 in all. First, according to the estimates submitted by the Navy in respect to the way they intended spending the money, it is not possible for the Navy to spend $25,000,000 during the present fiscal year. Some of the projects for which they ask this money can not be performed within the present fiscal year. The Army has not fixed any definite program, and that is why we cut down to $25,000,000 the amount they asked—$83,000,000. They intend building a dirigible and certain planes, and the specifications and the drawings for them do not yet exist. The $25,000,000 which we appropriated for them under present existing conditions can not possibly be spent during the present fiscal year. We did cut about fourteen or fifteen million dollars that the Army wanted, with which to buy land, and that is why certain gentlemen perhaps are peeved at this time. They wanted $3,000,000 to buy a field at Dayton, Ohio. I will give you the details of that land grab in a minute. In order to sugar that they put in $980,000 to buy some land in Buffalo and $3,000,000 more to buy land in New Jersey. There is about $9,000,000 they want for land alone, and it would take $10,000,000 to put the buildings on that land. This has nothing to do with the condition of the Air Service. The land they wanted to buy in New Jersey would take at least a year before it would be in condition to be used as an aviation field or as a field for dirigibles.

Then the distinguished Senator, and I am not criticizing but merely want to point out what was said, remarked that there was some comment on the sale of $22,000,000 worth of airplanes to the Curtiss people for $2,000,000. It seems an effort is made to justify this sale, and he says the planes were no good, "that they did not want to sell them to individuals, because they would crash," and then he said the Curtiss Co.——

Mr. BANKHEAD. To what Senator does the gentleman refer?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. To the distinguished gentleman, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman is out of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will proceed without discussing the attitude of Senators.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am not discussing the attitude of Senators, but I am reading from the RECORD. The RECORD shows that "the Curtiss Co. agreed to take a certain number, just as they run, and to get them out of the country," and as it appears from the RECORD of the Senate, "to let somebody else do the crashing." That statement perhaps was meant to be funny, but it is as unsportsmanlike and as unsoldierly as it is incorrect. We want to develop our aircraft industry. Surely that is no way to commence advertising our export trade.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Is it not a fact that the size of the personnel of the Air Service is not affected one way or the other by the size of the special appropriation for the Air Service to which the gentleman has been referring?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Absolutely not.

Mr. MONDELL. And that, therefore, any statement to the effect that it has been necessary to reduce the personnel of the Air Service because this particular appropriation was reduced is not correct?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman states it exactly. I will come to that in a minute. As to the question of these planes being sent out of the country, that is not the fact, because the Curtiss people are selling a large number of these planes in this country. As to their saying it is all junk, that is not correct, because I was informed to-day they are flying those planes off the field. As to saying that somebody else could do the crashing, if it were true that somebody else was going to do the crashing we should not sell them abroad. This country's industries put a guaranty on its exports. If the planes were junk for us they would be junk for anyone else. If they would crash here they could not be sold anywhere. Even if they were they would still bring more than 10 per cent of the cost price of $22,000,000. That simply goes to show how accurate were the statements of this particular discussion.

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Not just now. Now, as to the personnel, the Secretary testified before the committee yesterday, as did the Chief of Staff, that it is possible to transfer officers to the Air Service, to take fliers who desire to remain in the service and attach them to the Infantry and detail them to the Air Service. They have vacancies in the Infantry even if under the present ratio allowed Air Service, which is purely arbitrary, too small an allotment has been made. I hold in my hand, and which I shall insert in the RECORD, a letter under date of July 2, which shows there were 10 men in the Air Service promoted to be colonels and lieutenant colonels, only one of whom is a flying officer, and he has seen no service overseas during the war. If you are going to fill up the Air Service with favorites and relatives, regardless of the need of the service, you can not expect the best blood of this country, for such were our young fliers, to remain in the service. I charge that none of the men promoted has any special technical qualifications to carry out the work of that service, and so places are filled with high ranking officers and the technical work will necessarily have to be done by junior officers who ought to be on flying duty.

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. HULINGS. I desire to ask the gentleman if he knows of any Regular Army officer who flew as a pilot?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, yes. What the gentleman wants to ask is how many Regular Army officers flew over the lines?

Mr. HULINGS. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Gen Mitchell, who has a splendid record, and three or four others.

Mr. HULINGS. Three or four. I saw a statement that gave the appropriations made, and it stated that there was no flying force at all and only 232 officers in the service and that all of those were needed for administrative purposes. If we have no flying department, what is the need of administrative officers?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The administrative work is the easiest of all. Anybody can do that. The technical and flying branches require special trained and picked men. If they had 232 real fliers, that would take care of several squadrons needed at this time. Now, I introduced a resolution calling upon the Air Service to render a commercial inventory of what they had. They do not know what they have got. They can not tell us how many motors they have or about how many hours those motors have been used or how much material they have on hand. At the time they sold those $22,000,000 worth of planes they did not know whether they were old or junk. That is how the sale must have gone through; they apparently did not know the condition of those planes. Somebody is responsible, and I hope to locate the responsibility.

Now, going back to the land, the Aviation Service has a field at Dayton, Ohio, known as McCook's Field. This field was owned or controlled by certain gentlemen who were in the Air Service. They leased it to the city of Dayton, which in turn leased it to the Air Service. The Government spent millions of dollars on this ground improving it, and now these same gentlemen are anxious to have the city of Dayton rescind this lease, so that the property may revert to them greatly enhanced in value. I want to call the House's attention to the fact that the lease from the city of Dayton to the Government does not expire until the 5th day of January, 1927. The property which we were urged to purchase in Dayton, Ohio, is owned by the Moraine Development Co., and my information is that the same gentlemen who own the other tract of land are trying to sell the new land to the Government. The average assessed value of this land is $85 an acre. The price offered to the Government is away in excess of this. I will have more details in a few days and will inform the House. Anyone can see through this deal, and certainly had we spent $3,000,000 to please these gentlemen we would not have increased the Aviation Service with a single plane or done anything to develop the industry in this country. The tract of land in New Jersey is absolutely undeveloped; $3,000,000 was asked for it. It would take over a year to get that into condition, and that would in no way improve the present conditions in the Air Service. Nine hundred and eighty thousand dollars was asked for the land in Buffalo. The only argument I heard for this land was that it was adjacent to buildings in which the Government had put in several million dollars, and these buildings are now used to store motor trucks. Again, I ask the House if there is anything in this that would improve our Air Service? The House saw through this and, judiciously in its policy of economy, cut down the appropriation.

I want to take this opportunity to point out that I have found my committee and the membership of this House eager, anxious, and willing to do everything within reason to develop a great Air Service and aeronautical industry in this country.

The trouble with the Air Service is, as I have stated so many times on the floor of this House, it has had so much money in the past, that it has squandered and wasted so much, so many favorites have grown rich, that all about the air has been forgotten and now that they have squandered a billion of dollars and have to admit that they have not even planes for duty in certain places where they may be required, of course, it is sought to blame the House for lack of appropriation. Why, if we had appropriated another $640,000,000 the Air Service would be no better off than it is.

We must give American industry a chance to develop, and certainly there is no chance to develop as long as money is wasted on land projects or spent for machines in Europe. As an immediate remedy for present deplorable conditions in the Army Air Service I recommend that as many of the reserve pilots who were engaged in flying in Europe and in this country should desire to remain in the service, either permanently or temporarily, be given commissions and assigned to the Air Service until such time as an independent service is created and a sufficient number of men and officers provided for it. That all purchases of land be stopped and a definite program be adopted for the purchase of machines made in America. This is the way to develop American aeronautical industry. That proper, competent officers who have had experience in aviation and who have made good as flying officers in the war be placed in charge of the Army Air Service. [Applause.]

WAR DEPARTMENT, AIR SERVICE,
OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR,
Washington, D. C., July 2, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. LAGUARDIA: Replying to your letter of June 26, in which you ask that you be furnished name, rank, prior service, and record in the Air Service of all officers above the rank of captain in the Air Service who have been promoted within the last 90 days, the information you desire follows.

Delay in replying to your communication has been occasioned by obtaining the complete records of the officers concerned:

Promoted to major.

CAPT. JOHN W. SWANN.

Military record before entering Air Service: One and four-twelfths years Company M, Twenty-third United States Infantry, and 15 years Philippine Constabulary.

Military record after entering Air Service: Commissioned captain, Aviation Section, Signal Reserve Corps, August 22, 1917.

CAPT. JAMES J. NEWMAN.

Military record before entering Air Service: None.

Military record after entering Air Service: Commissioned captain, Signal Corps, from civil life, October 27, 1917.

CAPT. ALVIN C. REIS.

Military record before entering Air Service: None.

Military record after entering Air Service: Commissioned first lieutenant, Aviation Section, Signal Reserve Corps, from candidates reserve officers' training camp, November 17, 1917. Promoted to captain, Air Service, November 1, 1918.

CAPT. HENRY J. WHITEHOUSE.

Military record before entering Air Service: Appointed Plattsburg Training Camp summers of 1915 and 1916.

Military record after entering Air Service: Commissioned captain, Aviation Section, Signal Reserve Corps, from reserve officers' training camp, Plattsburg Barracks, November, 1917.

Promoted to lieutenant colonel.

MAJ. JAMES E. CHANEY.

Military record before entering Air Service: Cadet, United States Military Academy, 1904–1908; second lieutenant, Infantry, October 14, 1908; first lieutenant, Infantry, June 20, 1914; captain, Infantry, March 22, 1917.

Military record after entering Air Service: Appointed major, Signal Corps, September 22, 1917; executive officer, Chanute Field, Rantoul, Ill., November 5, 1917; commanding officer school of military aeronautics, University of Ohio, Columbus, Ohio, November 10, 1917, to January 6, 1918; executive officer, Operations Division, Division of Military Aeronautics, January 7, 1918, to August 8, 1918; overseas since September 3, 1918.

MAJ. HORACE M. HICKAM.

Military record before entering Air Service: Cadet, United States Military Academy, 1904–1908; second lieutenant, Cavalry, February 14, 1908; first lieutenant, Cavalry, December 8, 1914; captain, Cavalry, May 15, 1917.

Military record after entering Air Service: Major, Signal Corps, August 5, 1917; executive officer, aviation concentration depot, Garden City, N. Y., to May 8, 1918; flying instructor and athletic supervisor, Rockwell Field, San Diego, Calif., May 17, 1918, to September 12, 1918; executive officer and commanding officer Carlstrom Field, Arcadia, Fla., September 18, 1918, to January, 1919; chief, information group, since January, 1919.

Promoted to colonel.

LIEUT. COL. JAMES A. MARS.

Military record before entering Air Service: Cadet, United States Military Academy, 1899–1903; first lieutenant, Cavalry, March 11, 1911; captain, Cavalry, July 1, 1916.

Military record after entering Air Service: Appointed major, Signal Corps, November 28, 1917; on duty with Personnel Division, Division of Military Aeronautics, to January 1, 1918; commanding officer aviation general supply depot, Fairfield, Ohio, January 3, 1918, to November 12, 1918; promoted to lieutenant colonel February 26, 1918; officer in charge of demobilization of Air Service troops, November 14, 1918, to December 12, 1918; appointed Director Bureau of Aircraft Production December 19, 1919; on duty as such since that date.

LIEUT. COL. WILLIAM F. PEARSON.

Military record before entering Air Service: Private, corporal, sergeant, Twenty-eighth Battery, Field Artillery, 1902–1904; second lieutenant, Infantry, October 5, 1904; first lieutenant, Infantry, March 11, 1911; captain, Infantry, July 1, 1916.

J., September 26, 1917, to March 19, 1918; officer in charge supply depots, Washington, D. C., March 19, 1918, to May 10, 1918; chief of storage and traffic department, Bureau Aircraft Production, and officer in charge of acceptance parks, also assistant executive, Procurement Division, General Staff, January 10, 1918, to November 18, 1918; assistant to Acting Director of Aircraft Production, November 19, 1918, to January 2, 1919; assistant executive, Air Service, January 2, 1919, to January 30, 1919.

Very truly, yours,

CHAS. T. MENOHER,
Major General, United States Army,
Director of Air Service.

Hon. F. H. LAGUARDIA,
United States House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS], a member of the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, on last Wednesday, when bill No. 3754, to amend the copyright act, was called up by the chairman of the Committee on Patents, he made a very able statement in regard to the bill, but in view of the fact that there are many present to-day who were not here at that time, and also in view of the fact that considerable interest and desire for information was manifested by the number of questions propounded by Members of the House, the chairman has suggested that I make a statement in regard to the provisions and purposes of this bill. In the first place, I will say that the occasion for the need of this legislation grows out of war conditions.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order. I think we ought to have more than 50 men in the House in the consideration of a bill as important as this, and I make the point of order of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum, and evidently there is not.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On this roll call 291 Members have answered present. The Sergeant at Arms will open the doors.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call. Now that everybody else is here except the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], who made the point of no quorum, I think we can proceed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, when I was interrupted I had just explained that the necessity for this law grew out of war conditions, because of the fact that the facilities for transportation of books between the United States and foreign countries and the almost impossibility of publishing books during the war in countries other than those in which the authors resided amounted to a practical suspension of American authors obtaining copyright protection in England and other foreign countries, and it had the same result with respect to foreign authors obtaining copyrights in the United States. Diplomatic correspondence between our Government and the British Government resulted in a proposal from the British Government that the United States Congress enact a law amending the copyright law along the lines embodied in this proposed bill, and they promised a British order in council granting similar privileges and protection to American authors in return.

The Committee on Patents held hearings on this bill and undertook to very carefully consider it from every viewpoint, and the chairman of the committee received a letter from the Acting Secretary of State, in which he not only indorsed the bill but urged its passage. Furthermore, the secretary of the Authors' League of America, who also represented the Incorporated Society of Authors, Playwrights, and Composers, containing about 3,600 members, and the American Publishers' Copyright League, appeared before the committee and urged the passage of this bill. Furthermore, Mr. Solberg, the register of copyrights of the Library of Congress, appeared before the committee and urged the passage of the bill. We were further advised that the bill had been submitted to representatives of organized labor, and that they have likewise given it their sanction, because this law does not change the present provision requiring that foreign books shall be published in the United States before they are entitled to copyright protection.

We knew of no opposition from any source. We could learn of none on the committee, and all the members of the Committee on Patents who were present voted that the bill be favorably reported for passage.

Now, I shall undertake to briefly explain the provisions of the bill. It proposes to amend sections 8 and 21 of the copyright act approved March 4, 1909. All of section 1, beginning on line 1, page 1, and continuing to the word "Provided," on line 18, page 2, is simply a recitation of the language contained in the original copyright act. The amendatory provision begins at the word "Provided," on line 18, and reads:

Provided, however, That all works made the subject of copyright by the laws of the United States first produced or published abroad after August 1, 1914, and before the date of the President's proclamation of peace, of which the authors or proprietors are citizens or subjects of any foreign State or nation granting similar protection for works by citizens of the United States, the existence of which shall be determined by a copyright proclamation issued by the President of the United States, shall be entitled to the protection conferred by the copyright laws of the United States from and after the accomplishment, before the expiration of 15 months after the date of the President's proclamation of peace, of the conditions and formalities prescribed with respect to such works by the copyright laws of the United States: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to deprive any person of any right which he may have acquired by the republication of such foreign work in the United States prior to the approval of this act.

The preceding provisions of that section, and other sections in the original copyright act, provide the manner in which works by foreign authors may be copyrighted in this country; and the only change which is made by this proposed amendment is to protect works which were published in foreign countries during the war—that is, from August 1, 1914—and for 15 months after the proclamation of peace, and permitting them at any time within that period to come in and have their books copyrighted by complying with the regular provisions with respect to obtaining such copyright. In other words, it gives them no additional privileges, but simply extends the time within which foreign publications may be copyrighted so as to cover the period during which conditions have been so greatly disturbed and are still disturbed by war conditions.

Now, the purpose of our Government in desiring to grant this privilege is in order to procure a like privilege from foreign countries. And the Government of Great Britain has already promised to have an order in council made granting the same reciprocal rights to citizens of the United States upon the enactment of such a law by Congress, it not being necessary in England for same to be done by legislative enactment. When that is done by the privy council of Great Britain it will automatically result, as I am advised, that the protection of American books in all other countries will likewise be procured by the action of the Berne International Copyright Union, which includes Belgium, Denmark, France, Holland, Italy, Norway, Sweden, Spain, and Switzerland.

The Assistant Secretary of State——

Mr. CONNALLY. Before you get to that point, will you yield to a question?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the language in line 24, "the existence of which shall be determined by a copyright proclamation issued by the President of the United States," mean those countries that afford the same rights to American authors that we afford to their authors, or that fact shall be determined?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes, sir. This law we are proposing to enact will not become effective in favor of foreign authors until the President of the United States shall have made proclamation that such right has been accorded by such foreign countries.

Mr. CONNALLY. And naming the countries?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes, sir.

In addition, and in further response to the question of the gentleman from Texas, I wish to read briefly from a letter written by the Acting Secretary of State, Frank L. Polk, under date of June 24, to the chairman of the Committee on Patents. After referring to this bill and some preliminary matters, he adds this:

As of possible interest to you, it may be stated that the British Government has proposed to this Government an arrangement for such reciprocal protection for works of American and British authors published during the war.

It appears that under the proposed arrangement greater benefits will result to citizens of this country than will be obtained by British subjects, due to the fact that during the war the British Government was obliged to impose an embargo against importation of books, and, owing to other war causes, it was extremely difficult for American authors to obtain publication of their works in Great Britain within 14 days after publication in this country, as required by the British copyright law.

The existing law in England provides that before a copyright can be obtained by an American or other foreign author in England the book must be published in Great Britain within 14 days after its publication in this country or other foreign country, as the case may be. This, you will note, extends it for 15 months after the proclamation of peace. Now, in that connection I wish to explain to the Members of the House that before a copyright is granted by our Government to a citizen or subject of a foreign country our law requires that the foreign book must be actually printed in this country, within the confines of the United States, for sale and distribution, whereas the British law does not require that an American book shall be published in the sense of being printed in England or in Great Britain before it is entitled to the right of copyright. It simply requires that it shall be published in the sense of being placed on sale. However, the American authors and publishers say that it is frequently physically impossible to get American books to England and place them actually on sale within two weeks after their publication in the United States; and there is another amendment curing that defect, to which I shall later refer if my time does not expire.

Now, continuing the reading of the letter from the Assistant Secretary of State, he further states:

As the proposed amendment is intended to provide protection for American citizens who otherwise would forfeit valuable property rights as a result of the interference with transportation and communication, due to the war, it is believed that enactment of the measure will be advantageous to American citizens and will materially assist in the promotion of cordial and friendly relations with the various foreign Governments concerned.

So far as the protection of American interests abroad and the international relations of the United States are concerned, the pending bill has the sanction of this department.

In this connection, gentlemen, I wish to call your attention to the fact that the trading-with-the-enemy act suspended during the period of the war the requirement that works from our enemies—Germany, Austria, and so forth—must be presented within the time provided by the regular act. In other words, they have the right under the trading-with-the-enemy act to come in after the proclamation of peace and have all of their works which were published during the war given the copyright protection under our law. This bill is simply to extend to the countries of our Allies and their citizens the privilege which already exists by law with respect to our alien enemies. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACCRATE].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MACCRATE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the committee, in order that you may have some idea of the actual number of books published in America on which copyrights have not been obtainable because of war conditions I asked the register of copyrights in the Congressional Library to give me some figures. In 1914 there were 29,704 American books copyrighted, and from that time until the present time the number has been annually increasing, so that in 1918 and 1919 the total number of American books copyrighted was 36,615, making a grand total for the five years from 1914 to 1919 of 162,739 American books which have been copyrighted. During the war copyrights in foreign countries practically ceased, and the purpose of this bill, although it appears to give foreign authors the right of copyright in America, is actually intended to give American authors the right of copyright in foreign lands.

Now, with reference to books of foreign authors copyrighted during the war period I would say that from 1914 to 1919 there has been a total of 6,963 foreign books copyrighted in this country, as against a total of 12,589 books in the period from 1909 to 1914. That is, during the war foreign copyrights have fallen off about 40 per cent. This bill simply extends 15 months of grace whereby an author on the other side will have time in which to copyright his book on this side. It does not, however, interfere with any right which an American has gained by republishing those copyrighted works before this bill passes.

There is a proviso expressly excluding from the operation of the law those books that have been published in America during the period of the war.

The history of copyright legislation is very interesting, especially so far as the manufacturing clause is concerned. In section 21, which we also amend by this act, we provide for an extension of from 30 to 60 days, the ad interim protection, and an extension of 30 days to 4 months in which a man can republish his work in America. There were 100,000 books published in England from the time of the enactment of our law in 1909, and yet only 1 per cent of all these English books was actually reprinted in America, and the reason given for this small percentage of reprinting and republishing of English-language books in America was the fact that we did not allow sufficient time in which the English author could have his work reprinted and rebound to gain American copyright.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MacCRATE. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. I wanted to ask the gentleman whether Russia was to be included in this legislation, and whether it had in view the admission of Russian books?

Mr. MacCRATE. As I understand, Russia was not a member of the Berne conference held in 1885.

Mr. McKEOWN. Is there anything in our copyright laws relative to the nature and character of the books that may be copyrighted here?

Mr. MacCRATE. The gentleman suggests something that ran through the minds of certain other Members of this House. The copyright law, while it does specify that certain documents may be copyrighted, in no wise goes to the thing that the gentleman probably refers to, namely, Bolshevism and other books inculcating similar ideas, any more than it does to American books of similar purport.

Mr. McKEOWN. That is what I wondered about, whether or not under this bill more freedom would be given to writers whose works we have had occasion to wish were not published in this country.

Mr. MacCRATE. While that may be legislation that is desirable under the copyright law, I am afraid it would not be possible. It would require a force and corps of censors which we could not afford and which, I believe, the spirit of America would not tolerate.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will permit, I may say that this right of copyright does not entitle a book to circulation unless it is otherwise entitled to circulation.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MacCRATE. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Does not the gentleman think it is time in America for Congress to make provision in such a law as this for placing some kind of restriction on the publication of books which tend to promote anarchy in this country?

Mr. O'CONNELL. Is that a function of the Committee on Patents, or does it go to a higher authority?

Mr. BLANTON. It is the function of copyright.

Mr. MacCRATE. I would say, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], that we need have no fear of the contamination of the American mind by the publication of books, and I believe that if American authorities will provide funds in the cities and in the States for the proper compensation of the teachers of America, who instruct the youth of America, we need have no fear of a Russian Bolsheviki propaganda or any other propaganda.

Mr. BLANTON. I think the reason why we have this anarchistic propaganda in this country is that we can not keep enough men here to get through the legislation that we ought to pass. I think we ought to have at least 50 men present, and I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum.

Mr. MacCRATE. Will the gentleman reserve that right for a moment?

Mr. O'CONNELL. Will the gentleman reserve his point of order until the gentleman from New York has finished his remarks?

Mr. BLANTON. I will reserve my point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York will proceed.

Mr. MacCRATE. Gentlemen, with reference to copyright books, there are 162,000 American books published since the war began, most of which have not been copyrighted in foreign countries. In 1837 American authors first sought to have an international copyright law enacted in America. Henry Clay introduced the resolution in the House. Since then authors have always contended that there should be a republic of letters, and that, with a suitable international copyright law, American authors could interpret America to Europe. It may truly be said that American authors have done much to give other lands a proper understanding of this Nation, and with these 162,000 volumes they may do more; but may I suggest to you that the interpretation of American ideals no longer depends on the authors of America. Our boys, 2,000,000 strong, not by books in any copyright office in Europe, but as living epistles on the fields of France, have interpreted forever the real spirit of America. Seventy thousand sealed volumes of American youth, each of hardly 25 yearly pages, laid away on the earthy shelves of foreign soil, are the silent witnesses to the world that America has a soul. [Applause.] And may I further say that while some foreign books come here which perhaps ought not to be copyrighted, in the district from which I come and the great city of which we are a part we have a population made in large part of men who have come from foreign countries, whose sons have gone with native sons to the other side carrying the arms and under the flag of America, and have interpreted real Americanism better than some American-born Bolsheviki ever will do it, no matter what books they publish. [Applause.] In my district, comprising only 7 square miles, we have 17 languages spoken; yet when the draft law was enacted in one local board only one man claimed to be a conscientious objector. We sent for him as members of the board and inquired what he objected to conscientiously. His name did not suggest a conscientious objector, and he said, jokingly, "I have been hearing about conscientious objectors, but the only conscientious objection I have is to being shot." [Laughter.]

Of 3,700 young men whose names were listed in the first draft in that board, 2,000 were born outside of the United States, and only 1,700 were born in the United States. The fifth man on that list was a lad named Sylvestre Cucciari, an Italian without citizenship papers. We said to him, "Sylvestre, do you want to claim exemption?" He said, "No; I am going back to Italy to show them how much I love America." Sylvestre Cucciari went to the other side. He is now numbered with the 70,000 the books of whose lives were marked "Finis" on Flanders fields, and on him and them, native and foreign born, America has stamped forever her "Copyright."

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, if we are going to consider the bill I think we ought to have a quorum. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Obviously no quorum is present.

Mr. NOLAN. I move a call of the House. In the meantime I suggest to the gentleman from Texas who makes the point of no quorum that he stay here.

Mr. BLANTON. I have been here all day and every day this session, I will say to the gentleman from California.

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order. The question is on ordering a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 257 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 12, insert after the word "book" the word "first."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. NOLAN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE RAGSDALE.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the following resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. J. WILLARD RAGSDALE, a Representative from the State of South Carolina.

Resolved, That a committee of 15 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The resolutions were agreed to.

The Clerk read the following further resolution:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect this House do now adjourn.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, July 24, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of Labor, transmitting information relative to the connection of certain of the department's employees with the case of Thomas J. Mooney (H. Doc. No. 157); to the Committee on Labor and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, requesting the authorizing of an expenditure up to the amount of $500,000 to fight forest fires in Idaho (H. Doc. No. 158); to the Committee on the Public Lands and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a proposed bill authorizing the use of radio stations under the control of the Navy Department for commercial purpose (H. Doc. No. 159); to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. CARTER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 288) for the purpose of conferring citizenship upon Indians, segregation of Indian tribal property, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 144), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. FESS, from the Committee on Education, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 4438) to provide for the promotion of vocational rehabilitation of persons disabled in industry or otherwise and their return to civil employment, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 145), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. SELLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred sundry bills of the House, reported in lieu thereof the bill (H. R. 7775) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and to certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors, accompanied by a report (No. 146), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolution, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. WINSLOW: Petition of citizens of Worcester, Mass., in re passage of House bill 6810, a bill to prohibit intoxicating beverages, etc.; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, July 24, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we thank Thee for coming more and more out of the shadow into the glorious light and life of the new day. The motives that Thou dost appeal to are the strength of life. The influences of Thy grace constitute life's glory. The revelations of Thy will are the deep and abiding purpose of the living. Grant us this day the influence of Thy spirit that we may discharge as men of God the duties that are upon us. For Christ's sake. Amen.

On request of Mr. BRANDEGEE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, July 23, 1919.

To the Senate:

Through your Secretary, under date of July 17, I am in receipt of copy of a resolution, S. Res. 123.

The resolution calls for a large amount of information regarding details of the work of the Reclamation Service which will take some weeks to secure.

The matter will be taken in hand at once, and report made as requested as soon as possible.

Cordially, yours, FRANKLIN K. LANE,
Secretary.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

CURRENCY IN CIRCULATION (S. DOC. NO. 59).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 22, 1919.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: In compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the United States of July 8, 1919, transmitted to me by the Secretary of the Senate under date of July 9, I submit the following:

Under the act approved May 30, 1908, commonly known as the Aldrich-Vreeland Act, as amended, additional or emergency currency was issued, beginning on August 4, 1914, in amount $382,502,645. All of this additional circulation was retired before the close of the calendar year 1915. Authority for the issue of such additional or emergency currency expired by limitation on June 30, 1915.

No emergency currency has been issued by the Federal reserve banks. However, such banks have issued Federal reserve bank notes and Federal reserve notes in accordance with the provisions of law and under the general supervision of the Federal Reserve Board. None were outstanding August 1, 1914. The amounts of such notes in circulation on July 1, 1919, were:

Federal reserve bank notes	$163,682,696
Federal reserve notes	2,493,992,462

The Treasury Department has no intention, nor, indeed, the power, to retire or withdraw from circulation any thereof, nor, as I am advised, has the Federal Reserve Board. The Federal Reserve System was devised to create an elastic currency which would expand and contract automatically in accordance with the requirements of business. Any reduction in the amounts of Federal reserve notes outstanding will be in accordance therewith. Federal reserve bank notes, for the most part, have been issued to replace silver certificates canceled and retired in accordance with the provisions of the act of April 23, 1918.

I transmit herewith a copy of the Treasury Department Circulation Statement for August 1, 1914, and July 1, 1919, showing the amount of money of the United States in circulation on the respective dates. Data are not available in the department with respect to the amount of money in circulation in the Territories and possessions of the United States.

Respectfully, CARTER GLASS,
Secretary of the Treasury.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The communication and accompanying paper will lie on the table for the present and be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House agrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7413) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the concurrent resolution of the Senate to print 50,000 copies of the treaty with Germany in the English text alone, and without maps, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 3754) to amend sections 8 and 21 of the copyright act, approved March 4, 1909, in which is requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 7413) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. BRANDEGEE obtained the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	France	Lenroot	Sheppard
Ball	Gay	Lodge	Smith, Ariz.
Bankhead	Gronna	McCormick	Smith, Ga.
Beckham	Hale	McCumber	Smith, S. C.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] is necessarily detained from the Senate.

Mr. KING. I wish to announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] are detained on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-eight Senators have responded. There is a quorum present.

TREATY WITH FRANCE.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for about 10 minutes to make a statement regarding a matter that I think is of considerable importance in relation to the pending treaty, if I may have the consent of the Senate to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Connecticut will proceed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, on July 10 the President appeared before the Senate and made the following statement. I read from page 2339 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. He said:

I shall presently have occasion to lay before you a special treaty with France whose object is the temporary protection of France from unprovoked aggression by the power with whom this treaty of peace has been negotiated. Its terms link it with this treaty. I take the liberty, however, of reserving it, because of its importance, for special explication on another occasion.

I received this morning through the mail a publication entitled Harvey's Weekly. There is an article on the first page of that publication entitled "President Wilson violates his own treaty." I will read it:

"Does President Wilson regard the Franco-American treaty as a mere scrap of paper? If not, why did he deliberately violate one of its most important provisions within a fortnight after he, as 'President of the United States,' and Mr. Lansing, as 'Secretary of State of the United States,' attached their official signatures to the agreement?

"That he did that very thing there can be no question. Article 4 of the treaty reads:

"The present treaty will be submitted to the Senate of the United States at the same time as the treaty of Versailles is submitted to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification.

"Submitted by whom? By the President himself, of course, who alone is empowered to submit treaties, who alone with the Secretary of State has a right to sign them, and who with the Secretary of State did sign this one. And it was as 'President of the United States of America' that he entered into this engagement with the duly authorized representatives of the French Republic and gave in writing, under the great seal of this honorable Nation, that solemn pledge.

"Did he keep it? He did not. This is what he said and all he said respecting the treaty on July 10, when he submitted the treaty of Versailles to the Senate:

"I shall presently have occasion to lay before you a special treaty with France, whose object is the temporary protection of France from unprovoked aggression by the power with whom this treaty of peace has been negotiated. Its terms link it with this treaty. I take the liberty, however, of reserving it for special explication on another occasion.

"He did not submit the treaty; he did not divulge its terms; he did not even summarize it; he simply 'took the liberty' of violating it.

"Why? There must have been some reason for the incorporation of that particular provision in the Franco-American treaty. There is none such in the Franco-British treaty, wherein article 4 provides merely that 'the present treaty shall before ratification by His Majesty be submitted to Parliament for approval,' not coincidently with the submission of the treaty of Versailles nor at any other specified time.

"How can this marked difference be accounted for? We can only conjecture, of course, but it is surely a fair presumption that the provision was not inserted at the instigation of the President, who would hardly have gone out of his way to bind himself unnecessarily to do a certain thing upon a certain day. Seemingly, then, the idea must have originated in the French Government.

"But why should M. Clemenceau have desired so particularly that the two treaties should be placed before the Senate simultaneously? Again we can only guess, but is it not reasonable to surmise that he, being aware of the coequal treaty-making powers of the Senate, felt that all interests, especially those of France, would best be served by presenting to that body both agreements as embodied in the two treaties at one and the same time, and thus enable it to consider and act upon each with full knowledge of what the other contained?

"Such procedure would possess at least the merit of frankness and open dealing and could not fail to impress the Senate favorably. It seems strange that the premier should not have taken for granted that the President would take this natural course, but being old and wise and prudent he apparently preferred to take no chances; so he put it in black and white, and the President signed the commitment.

"Why he subsequently broke his pledge is a matter of speculation. Perhaps he feared that one of the treaties might run crosswise to the other, or that the Senate might think that if one were ratified the other need not be. Then there was the question of the need of a special pact if the league were anything more than a shell. Discussion, involving close analyses and striking contrasts, at any rate would better be averted if possible; so all of M. Clemenceau's painstaking caution went for naught, and the presentation of full information to the Senate which he thought was assured was not made after all.

"Or it may be that there were things in the separate treaty itself which the President thought would better not be revealed at the moment. In any case, to the best of our knowledge, it has not yet been published in this country, which seems strange, if we are correctly informed that it has appeared in England, in view of the enterprise of our great newspapers in promptly presenting to their readers the texts of documents of such obvious importance, unless, of course, prevented by the censor.

"Anyhow, here it is:

"Whereas the United States of America and the French Republic are equally animated by the desire to maintain the peace of the world so happily restored by the treaty of peace signed at Versailles the 28th day of June, 1919, putting an end to the war begun by the aggression of the German Empire and ended by the defeat of that power; and

"Whereas the United States of America and the French Republic are fully persuaded that an unprovoked movement of aggression by Germany against France would not only violate both the letter and the spirit of the treaty of Versailles to which the United States of America and the French Republic are parties, thus exposing France anew to the intolerable burdens of an unprovoked war, but that such aggression on the part of Germany would be and is so regarded by the treaty of Versailles as a hostile act against all the powers signatory to that treaty and as calculated to disturb the peace of the world by involving inevitably and directly the States of Europe and indirectly, as experience has amply and unfortunately demonstrated, the world at large; and

"Whereas the United States of America and the French Republic fear that the stipulations relating to the left bank of the Rhine contained in the said treaty of Versailles may not at first provide adequate security and protection to France, on the one hand, and the United States of America, as one of the signatories of the treaty of Versailles, on the other: Therefore

"The United States of America and the French Republic having decided to conclude a treaty to effect these necessary purposes, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, and Robert Lansing, Secretary of State of the United States, specially authorized thereto by the President of the United States, and Georges Clemenceau, president of the council, minister of war, and Stéphen Pichon, minister of foreign affairs, specially authorized thereto by Raymond Poincaré, President of the French Republic, have agreed upon the following articles:

"ARTICLE 1.

"In case the following stipulations relating to the left bank of the Rhine contained in the treaty of peace with Germany signed at Versailles the 28th day of June, 1919, by the British Empire, the French Republic, and the United States of America among other powers:

"'ART. 42. Germany is forbidden to maintain or construct any fortifications either on the left bank of the Rhine or on the right bank to the west of a line drawn 50 kilometers to the east of the Rhine.

"'ART. 43. In the area defined above the maintenance and assembly of armed forces, either permanently or temporarily, and military maneuvers of any kind, as well as the upkeep of all permanent works for mobilization, are in the same way forbidden.

"'ART. 44. In case Germany violates in any manner whatever the provisions of articles 42 and 43, she shall be regarded as committing a hostile act against the powers signatory of the present treaty and as calculated to disturb the peace of the world'—

"may not at first provide adequate security and protection to France, the United States of America shall be bound to come immediately to her assistance in the event of any unprovoked movement of aggression against her being made by Germany.

"ARTICLE 2.

"The present treaty, in similar terms with the treaty of even date for the same purpose concluded between the French Republic and Great Britain, a copy of which treaty is annexed hereto, will only come into force when the latter is ratified.

"ARTICLE 3.

"The present treaty must be submitted to the council of the league of nations and must be recognized by the council, acting, if need be, by a majority, as an engagement which is consistent with the covenant of the league; it will continue in force until, on the application of one of the parties to it, the council, acting, if need be, by a majority, agrees that the league itself affords sufficient protection.

"ARTICLE 4.

"The present treaty will be submitted to the Senate of the United States at the same time as the treaty of Versailles is submitted to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification. It will be submitted before ratification to the French Chamber of Deputies for approval. The ratifications thereof will be exchanged on the deposit of ratifications of the treaty of Versailles at Paris, or as soon thereafter as shall be possible.

"The Franco-British treaty is substantially identical, with the exception that, instead of being 'bound to come immediately' to the assistance of France, like the United States, she merely 'agrees to come immediately.' Great Britain exempts all of her dominions from any obligation 'unless it is approved by the parliament of the dominion concerned,' and makes it a condition of her agreement 'that a similar obligation is entered into by the United States of America,' whereas the Franco-American treaty contains no such proviso as to the participation of Great Britain.

"We take pleasure in affording the Senate of the United States an opportunity to inspect this transcript of the Franco-American treaty, pending the arrival of the original, and we can not deny to it the additional privilege of meditating upon its amazingly quick violation by the President of the United States, who negotiated and executed it."

During the reading of the French treaty by Mr. BRANDEGEE,

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I prefer not to be interrupted.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator merely answer a question?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Provided it does not go into the RECORD. I do not want the reading of the treaty to be interrupted. I will answer the Senator at any other time. I will answer him now if he does not want it to go into the RECORD.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I wish to know where the Senator got his copy of the treaty and whether it is an authentic copy. I hold in my hand an authentic copy, and it does not seem to conform with what the Senator is reading.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course I am not vouching for this copy. I am reading from an article which appeared in the public press. If it is false, it ought to be denied. If the man has lied about it, he ought to be punished. If it is true, some other course ought to be taken.

Also before the conclusion of the reading by Mr. BRANDEGEE, a message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Probably that is the authentic copy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator that it is.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I see that it is sealed, while what I am reading is not; it is open.

After concluding the reading,

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Committee on Foreign Relations and the Senate itself have passed several resolutions asking for information during the pendency of the peace treaty. No response whatever has been made to any of those requests. The President said to us that the Franco-American treaty and the peace treaty were linked together. If that is so, they ought to have been considered together.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair deems it but just to state to the Senator from Connecticut that the Chair was mistaken about the nature of the treaty.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is it a matter of executive business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a matter of executive business, but it is not the treaty.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then, of course, I will not inquire what it is. It appears, however, that I have not performed a work of supererogation entirely.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, may I make an inquiry of the Chair?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Now I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I did not understand the statement of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair stated that the message of the President was not with reference to this matter.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is not as to this treaty?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not as to this treaty.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Nebraska will put in the authentic copy later on. I have no doubt he has it.

When the President returned to this country last February he was kind enough to entertain the Committee on Foreign Relations at the White House. I had the pleasure of enjoying his hospitality and spent a very pleasant evening. During the course of that interview he stated that there had been four plans for a league of nations before the peace commission—a French plan; an Italian plan, which was, as he said, not so much in detail, but a mere skeleton plan; an American plan; and a British plan. Upon invitation, I took the liberty of asking him what became of the American plan, and he stated that it was laid aside. I asked him what plan was adopted, and he said the British plan; or perhaps he said, "Well, when I say the British plan, there was a plan proposed by Gen. Smuts, which was before the commission, and that was the substance of the plan we adopted, with some modifications."

I want to be perfectly fair about this statement. I do not think because it was a British plan that necessarily it was a bad plan at all; it may be the best that could have been devised, but I am stating what the President said. There was nothing confidential about it. I asked him if the American plan, which he had proposed to the commission, had been made public. He said it had not. I asked him if he saw any objection to having it printed and made public. He said he saw no objection. I then said I hoped that that would be done.

Well, in two or three days the President went back to Europe again. The Secretary of State also was in Europe. So I wrote to Mr. Frank L. Polk, who is a dear friend of mine and a splendid official, and I asked him if he would send me a copy of the so-called American plan to which the President had referred. Mr. Polk was away, being overworked, as most of us have been, by duties imposed upon us by the war and the attempt to make peace. After about 10 days I received this letter from him:

THE COUNSELOR FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, April 18, 1919.

MY DEAR SENATOR BRANDEGEE: In my absence Mr. Phillips acknowledged your letter to me of April 3, reporting your conversation with the President on February 27 and requesting that a copy of the American plan of the league of nations be furnished to you, so that you may know what our representatives at the peace conference had recommended and that the plan may be made public.

A cablegram was sent to the mission on this subject, explaining that the department had not yet received a copy of the American plan to which you referred. I have to-day received a reply from the American mission stating that copies of the American plan will be brought back at the time of the return of the President and the mission to the United States.

The department has no copies of this plan, as the files of the peace mission are being kept together in Paris until the conclusion of the conference, and in the meantime the department is not receiving the draft proposals presented to the various committees and subcommittees.

Yours, sincerely,

FRANK L. POLK.

The Hon. FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

That is a perfectly straightforward and sufficient answer to me, so far as the State Department is concerned; but since the President has returned the Senate has passed a resolution asking for the American plan. We get no attention paid to it whatever; no response has been made to any request either of the Committee on Foreign Relations or of the Senate for information.

The President, having exercised his perfectly constitutional function of negotiating a treaty, appeared here and presented it to the Senate, his partner in the treaty-making power of this Nation. He made his argument in favor of it. He has performed his constitutional function, in my opinion. If he has anything more to say, he can appear before the Senate at any time and will always be courteously received. He can, of course, appear either in person or by his representatives before any committee of either or both branches of Congress, and will always be politely and courteously and gladly received; but, having tried his case before the jury, before the Senate, as his equal copartner in the treaty-making power, now he sends for the individual jurymen and wants to argue with each one of them separately. It is the Senate of the United States that is the partner of the Executive in the treaty-making power; and if there is any information further than what he conveyed I think he ought to come before the Senate and advise the Senate of it, or, at least, before the Committee on Foreign Relations, if he desires so to do. I think the country is entitled to this information; I think, before it can properly give consideration to this great treaty, which has been called "the establishment of new world orders," that the Senate and the people of America are entitled to more information than the mere ipse dixit of the President of the United States.

Mr. President, as I have said, this treaty has been published in London and Paris; it has been laid before the French Chamber of Deputies with article 4 in it, a part of the consideration upon which the French Government signed the treaty with us that it should be presented to the Senate at the same time the treaty of Versailles was presented.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

Mr. LODGE. Would it interrupt the Senator if I should make a brief statement?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Not at all.

Mr. LODGE. When the Senator from Connecticut showed me this article before the assembling of the Senate, it seemed to me inconceivable that the fourth article should be there. I presumed the editor, Col. Harvey, was very accurate and careful, but it seemed to me simply inconceivable. I saw a copy of the London Times, which contains the fourth article as it appeared in the White Book, which was laid before the House of Commons, but I could not get a copy from private hands. However, at the club I found a copy of the French paper Le Figaro.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. A Paris paper?

Mr. LODGE. A Paris paper, Le Figaro, of July 3, and on the front page appears an article headed "Guarantee of the peace." It says:

Yesterday there was laid upon the table of the chamber the text of the pact or treaty of guaranty between France, the United States, and Great Britain, signed on the 28th of last June. It is as follows—

The date of the paper is the 3d of July, and the treaty was laid before the Chamber of Deputies on the 2d day of July. The paper then gives the two treaties in full. I find the fourth article as follows—I will read it in French, so that there can be no mistake, and then I will read it in English:

ART. 4. Le présent traité sera, avant ratification, soumis aux Chambres françaises pour approbation. Il sera soumis au Sénat des Etats-Unis en même temps que le Traité de Versailles sera soumis au Sénat pour avis et assentiment à la ratification.

The present treaty will be before ratification submitted to the French Chambers for approval. It will be submitted to the Senate of the United States at the same time the treaty of Versailles will be submitted to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification.

The French language is extremely exact, and there is no question as to the terms of that treaty as submitted to the French Chamber and as submitted to the House of Commons.

There may be good reasons for paying no attention to the provisions of article 4, but as it was evident that it was put in by the French prime minister and M. Pichon, secretary of state for foreign affairs, with a very considerate feeling toward the Senate of the United States, I can not but regret that it was not laid before us at the same time as the treaty of Versailles, as the signed instrument required.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I am not very familiar with diplomatic methods or with treaty making, but article 4 seems to me to be a rather unusual provision to be incorporated in any treaty. Ordinarily the commissioners, I should say, who would negotiate with each other would have a personal understanding about such a thing, but to embed it in an article in the treaty itself, which makes it a part of the consideration for the signing of the international contract, which is now signed so far as the executives of these great powers can attend to it, strikes me as rather an unusual proceeding. They can not change it or alter its conditions. Of course, they may violate them, but the only way they can get article 4 out of the treaty, if it is in there—and I know nothing about it, except what I have seen in the newspapers and magazines; I am not permitted to know—is to reassemble the peace conference, reconsider their action, and make a new contract.

Here is article 4. I do not know whether or not it has been scratched out with a pen by somebody in this country. That would not take it out of the treaty or get it out of the contract. You can not get a hook out of your jaw in that way.

Mr. President, I do not read French, and so I could not understand what the Senator from Massachusetts read until he interpreted it, but I can read English. Here is the London Times, another copy of which you will find it very difficult to get in this country. The London Times office here has not got one. The Metropolitan Club, which has always subscribed for it, can not get a copy of the issue of July 4, although it should have been here on July 11 at the latest, seven days for the steamship passage being a good record now. Here is the "Thunderer," the London Times, of July 4:

The triple pact—

And the whole covenant is here; every Britisher knows about our treaty with France as well as their own, but we do not know about it, and can not.

The triple pact—Anglo-American promise to France—Terms of the treaties.

All the treaties are printed on page 16 of the London Times of July 4, which has not arrived in this country yet, except this one copy which I have. I secured it in a perfectly honorable and legitimate way, but one can not go down town and get a copy for love nor money. Here is article 4 exactly as the Senator from Massachusetts read it from the Figaro, of Paris:

The present treaty will be submitted to the Senate of the United States at the same time as the treaty of Versailles is submitted to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification. It will be submitted before ratification to the French Chamber of Deputies for approval. The ratifications thereof will be exchanged on the deposit of ratifications of the treaty of Versailles at Paris or as soon thereafter as shall be possible.

That is an exact duplicate of what I read from Harvey's Weekly and of what the Senator from Massachusetts has read. Now, all the world knows about this treaty except we who are to be bound by it, and furnish the goods, and be the pack horse, and carry out the terms of it.

I ask, Mr. President, that as a part of my remarks the article to which I have referred, headed "The triple pact," be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"THE TRIPLE PACT—ANGLO-AMERICAN PROMISE TO FRANCE—TERMS OF THE TREATIES.

"The text of the Franco-British and Franco-American treaties signed at Versailles on the day when the peace treaty was signed (June 28) is issued as a White Paper (Cmd. 221). These treaties are interdependent, and come into force only when both have been ratified by the legislatures concerned. The following is the text of the treaty between Great Britain and France 'respecting assistance to France in the event of unprovoked aggression by Germany':

"Whereas there is a danger that the stipulations relating to the left bank of the Rhine contained in the treaty of peace signed this day at Versailles may not at first provide adequate security and protection to the French Republic; and

"Whereas His Britannic Majesty is willing, subject to the consent of his Parliament, and provided that a similar obligation is entered into by the United States of America, to undertake to support the French Government in the case of an unprovoked movement of aggression being made against France by Germany; and

"Whereas His Britannic Majesty and the President of the French Republic have determined to conclude a treaty to that effect, and have named as their plenipotentiaries for the purpose; that is to say:

"His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the seas, Emperor of India;

"The Right Hon. David Lloyd-George, M. P., first lord of his treasury and prime minister; the Right Hon. Arthur James Balfour, O. M., M. P., his secretary of state for foreign affairs.

"The President of the French Republic;

"Mr. Georges Clemenceau, president of the council, minister of war; Mr. Stephen Pichon, minister of foreign affairs;

"Who, having communicated their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed as follows:

"ARTICLE 1.

"In case the following stipulations relating to the left bank of the Rhine contained in the treaty of peace with Germany, signed at Versailles the 28th day of June, 1919, by the British Empire, the French Republic, and the United States of America, among other powers:

"ART. 42. Germany is forbidden to maintain or construct any fortifications, either on the left bank of the Rhine or on the right bank to the west of a line drawn 50 kilometers to the east of the Rhine.

"ART. 43. In the area defined above the maintenance and assembly of armed forces, either permanently or temporarily, and military maneuvers of any kind, as well as the upkeep of all permanent works for mobilization, are in the same way forbidden.

"ART. 44. In case Germany violates in any manner whatever the provisions of articles 42 and 43, she shall be regarded as committing a hostile act against the powers signatory of the present treaty and as calculated to disturb the peace of the world.

"may not at first provide adequate security and protection to France, Great Britain agrees to come immediately to her assistance in the event of any unprovoked movement of aggression against her being made by Germany.

"ARTICLE 2.

"The present treaty, in similar terms with the treaty of even date for the same purpose concluded between the French Republic and the United States of America, a copy of which treaty is annexed hereto, will only come into force when the latter is ratified.

"ARTICLE 3.

"The present treaty must be submitted to the council of the league of nations, and must be recognized by the council, acting, if need be, by a majority, as an engagement which is consistent with the covenant of the league; it will continue in force until, on the application of one of the parties to it, the council, acting, if need be, by a majority, agrees that the league itself affords sufficient protection.

"ARTICLE 4.

"The present treaty shall before ratification by His Majesty be submitted to Parliament for approval.

"It shall before ratification by the President of the French Republic be submitted to the French Chambers for approval.

"ARTICLE 5.

"The present treaty shall impose no obligation upon any of the Dominions of the British Empire unless and until it is approved by the Parliament of the Dominion concerned.

"The present treaty shall be ratified, and shall, subject to articles 2 and 4, come into force at the same time as the treaty of peace with Germany of even date comes into force for the British Empire and the French Republic.

"In faith whereof the above-named plenipotentiaries have signed the present treaty, drawn up in the English and French languages.

"Done in duplicate at Versailles, on the 28th day of June, 1919.

"THE TREATY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

"The Franco-American treaty opens as follows:

"Whereas the United States of America and the French Republic are equally animated by the desire to maintain the peace of the world, so happily restored by the treaty of peace signed at Versailles the 28th day of June, 1919, putting an end to the war begun by the aggression of the German Empire and ended by the defeat of that power; and

"Whereas the United States of America and the French Republic are fully persuaded that an unprovoked movement of aggression by Germany against France would not only violate both the letter and the spirit of the treaty of Versailles, to which the United States of America and the French Republic are parties, thus exposing France anew to the intolerable burdens of an unprovoked war, but that such aggression on the part of Germany would be and is so regarded by the treaty of Versailles as a hostile act against all the powers signatory to that treaty and as calculated to disturb the peace of the world by involving inevitably and directly the States of Europe and indirectly, as experience has amply and unfortunately demonstrated, the world at large; and

"Whereas the United States of America and the French Republic fear that the stipulations relating to the left bank of the

Rhine contained in the said treaty of Versailles may not at first provide adequate security and protection to France on the one hand and the United States of America, as one of the signatories of the treaty of Versailles, on the other;

"Therefore the United States of America and the French Republic having decided to conclude a treaty to effect these necessary purposes, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, and Robert Lansing, Secretary of State of the United States, especially authorized thereto by the President of the United States, and Georges Clemenceau, President of the Council, Minister of War, and Stephen Pichon, Minister of Foreign Affairs, specially authorized thereto by Raymond Poincare, President of the French Republic, have agreed upon the following articles.

"Four articles similar to those of the Franco-British treaty follow. For the first article the words 'The United States of America shall be bound to come immediately to her assistance' take the place of the equivalent sentence in the Franco-British treaty. With the substitution of the words 'Great Britain' for 'United States of America' article 2 is identical. The wording of article 3 is the same as in the other treaty. Article 4 reads:

"'The present treaty will be submitted to the Senate of the United States at the same time as the treaty of Versailles is submitted to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification. It will be submitted before ratification to the French Chamber of Deputies for approval. The ratifications thereof will be exchanged on the deposit of ratifications of the treaty of Versailles at Paris or as soon thereafter as shall be possible.'"

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I thank the Senate for its indulgence, and beg its pardon for having trespassed so much upon its time. I am very much obliged.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, if I may have permission also for a few moments, I should like to make some comments on what the Senator from Connecticut has said.

In the first place, it seems to me like a tempest in a teapot to make such a hullabaloo over the discovery, apparently just made, of a treaty that has been in print for weeks, and which I have seen published in the United States. Many American newspapers published it three weeks ago. Millions of American people read it then and will smile at the Senator's discovery of it now.

In the second place, it seems to me, Mr. President, that some protest ought to be made here in the Senate against what seems to be a settled purpose on the part of a few Senators to criticize and discredit the President on all possible occasions, however trifling the subject of criticism may be.

Mr. President, what were the facts in this case?

When the President of the United States came before the Senate to lay before us the great treaty which must necessarily occupy the time and the attention of the Senate for weeks to come, he took occasion, in the midst of his address, to use this language:

> I shall presently have occasion to lay before you a special treaty with France, whose object is the temporary protection of France from unprovoked aggression by the power with whom this treaty of peace has been negotiated. Its terms link it with this treaty. I take the liberty, however, for reserving it for special explication on another occasion.

Mr. President, is there any ground for charging a serious offense against the President of the United States? He made no concealment of facts. He stated in a few words what this treaty is; and the treaty may be read a hundred times, and no different analysis of the treaty can be made than the President makes in this paragraph.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. He submitted to the Senate in writing the great treaty which will be the subject of long discussion and great study—the treaty which is now before the Committee on Foreign Relations, and which necessarily must take up the chief time not only of the committee but of the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I knew the Senator would, because I yielded to the Senator, and I knew he would return the courtesy.

The question is not whether the President made a summary of this treaty. Article 4 of the proposed treaty, unless the documents I have submitted are false, provides that he contracted with France to lay that treaty before the Senate at the same time he laid the treaty of Versailles before the Senate. Did he do it?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the gist of the article to which the Senator refers is that the two matters shall be before the Senate at the same time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is this the time? Are they here now?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They will be here at the same time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, in the limit, yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We have the President's word that presently he will do this thing.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. When does "presently" arrive?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is not for me to say nor for the Senator to say. The President has made no promise to the Senate. He entered into an arrangement with France, and if there is any ground for complaint France and not the Senator from Connecticut has the right to complain.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am not complaining. I am calling attention to these articles. If there is any complaint about it, the American Nation and France, I guess, will make the complaint. It is immaterial to me what the Senator from Nebraska thinks about it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator may not be complaining; perhaps not. What he is doing is carrying out a settled purpose to attack and criticize the President on every occasion, however slight.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What I am doing is to try to get the President to treat the Senate as he wants to be treated himself.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator and his close associates for months have adopted a settled policy of nagging and discrediting the President of the United States while he was engaged in the stupendous work of negotiating this treaty; and, Mr. President, I want to call to the attention of Senators what has been one of the results of this settled purpose of a few Senators—and I am not charging all Senators on that side with this offense, because I know they are free from it.

What has been one of the outstanding effects of this attempt, this settled purpose to nag and discredit the representative of the United States in Paris? It has been to weaken his influence there; and when his influence has been weakened, when his power there has been affected by this systematic discrediting in the United States, and when he has been forced to give way to contentions on the other side, contentions of other countries, then the same Senators rise in their places here and condemn the President because he yielded.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. MOSES. Does the Senator from Nebraska think that if a different policy had been pursued in this country the President would have had sufficient force at Paris to withstand the Japanese and to prevent the shame of Shantung?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I do not know what would have been the effect in relation to Shantung. I know, and the whole world knows, that the President of the United States stood over there single-handed and alone contending for ideals, contending for justice, contending for the things that the public opinion of the world justifies, contending for them against the material demands of the interested nations; and I know he would have been stronger if it had been known that the coordinate branch of the Government of the United States was behind him in his position. I know that the attempts made here to discredit him undoubtedly embarrassed him; and I say it comes with poor grace from Senators who thus sought to hamstring him and stab him in the back to stand upon the floor of the Senate now and criticize him because he was forced to yield at times and could not carry out all of the great purposes which he had in mind.

But, Mr. President, that is not all. The President is criticized because he has not at once and simultaneously laid these two treaties before the Senate. He is criticized because he did not make two speeches at once, at one and the same time, because he elected after giving due notice to present them on separate occasions, while they should both still be before the Senate of the United States.

But that is not all. Now the Senator from Connecticut rises in his place and condemns the President of the United States because he has sought personal interviews with Members of the Senate of the United States——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And the President's act is likened to a man tampering with members of a jury charged with the solemn duty of trying a case.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think he could tamper with any of you.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator used that language.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. He used the language that the President was appealing to the individual members of a jury——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I repeat it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. A thing that is discreditable and, as the Senator knows, contrary to the law.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know that the President has sent for individual Senators after he has stated his case before the Senate, and he has done so for a purpose. If he is satisfied with it, I do not complain about it. He has not sent for me. If he does at any time, I will go always to consult with the President; but I have my own views about things. I do not object to his sending for you Senators or for anybody he wants to. It would seem to me that if he wanted to get his treaty through, and thought he had any information that would contribute to that purpose, he would send for the committee that has jurisdiction of it, and not for those who are not on the committee. Still, that is none of my business.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, one would think from the attitude taken by the Senator from Connecticut that Senators had never been sent for before. One would think that it is a disgraceful thing for the President to ask a Senator to come to meet him at the White House and discuss this treaty with him. Why should he not do it? Does he not do it on other occasions? Has not the very charge been brought against the President of the United States by the selfsame Senators who now criticize him that he neglected to consult the Members of the Senate?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Not by me.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That he failed to discuss matters with them?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Not by me.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That he kept them in the dark and refused to reveal to them the secrets of diplomacy?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The criticism is that he keeps the Senate and the country in the dark; not the Senators, but the Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, that is a new charge. The Senator has heretofore criticized the President because he has withheld from Members of the Senate information which they were entitled to receive; and the Senator himself, while he was upon the floor, criticized the President because the President had not delivered to him personally something that he had asked for when he was enjoying the hospitality of the President at the White House.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not. I stated that Mr. Polk said he did not have it. I do not know where it is. It may be over in Paris or somewhere else. I hope it is not lost, but I have my doubts.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, I am authorized to say to the Senator that it will appear in due time——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. "Presently."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And some of the vain imaginings which the Senator has indulged in as to this being a British league of nations will be dispelled if he takes the opportunity to read the articles in the league.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have disavowed the belief that it is a British league of nations. I simply accept the Senator's statement that the plan proposed by Gen. Smuts was the basis of the plan that was finally adopted. It was modified, I have no doubt. I do not claim that it is a British league of nations.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I have about finished.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I simply do not want the Senator to misrepresent me; that is all.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I certainly would not care to misrepresent any Senator. I simply rise to protest against this continuation of the nagging policy, and to condemn the systematic effort being made to discredit and criticize the President of the United States on all occasions. At this time, it is true, it can not do the harm that it could heretofore. It defeats itself. He is here to take care of himself, and he will do it. He is now in the United States, and is, I think, doing the right thing when he is appealing to the individual Members of the Senate on both sides to support this treaty. He has the right to do it, and individual Senators have the right to talk to him; and the Senator from Connecticut is criticizing an individual Senator who goes to the White House as much as he is criticizing the President himself when he condemns that method of negotiation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I have just as good a right to criticize the Senator as the Senator has to criticize me; and I do not think either one of the criticisms will seriously affect the health of the person criticized.

Mr. HITCHCOCK subsequently said: A short time ago the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] read into the RECORD a purported copy of the proposed treaty between the United States and France. He gave the impression to the Senate that it had not been given publicity in this country until it appeared in Harvey's Weekly which he held in his hand. I stated at the time that it was my impression that I had seen the full publication in American newspapers. I have since verified that impression, and I ask leave now to incorporate in my remarks made at that time the statement that the treaty read to-day by the Senator from Connecticut as a great discovery of himself and Harvey's Weekly was brought to the United States through the agency of the Associated Press and was published broadcast in all of the leading papers in the United States. I hold in my hands a copy of the Evening Star of Washington, of July 3, containing a verbatim report on that date, several weeks ago, of the identical treaty which the Senator from Connecticut read here this morning as a great discovery. This is merely an illustration of the preposterous character of the mare's-nests which the enemies of the President discover from time to time.

Mr. MOSES. The Senate will be glad to know, Mr. President, that the columns of the newspapers replace adequately the official sources of information to which the Senate should have a proper recourse.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes, Mr. President; but the charge was made here and the implication was conveyed that only the London Times carried this publication on July 3, and that a copy of the London Times was almost impossible to secure in this country; yet millions of intelligent people in the United States have read word for word what the Senator from Connecticut thus designated as impossible to secure.

Mr. SMOOT. I merely wish to ask the Senator from Nebraska if he now thinks that the treaty as read by the Senator from Connecticut is the same as the official treaty? The Senator said that he had a copy of the official treaty, and while the Senator from Connecticut was reading I understood the Senator from Nebraska to say that the official copy was not in conformity with the treaty which was being read by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I made no direct statement to that effect; but there are differences in phraseology between the copy which I secured from the State Department and the copy which the Senator from Connecticut read out of the newspaper this morning. The statement read by the Senator from Connecticut, however, was identical with what had been published by the Associated Press three weeks ago as a cablegram from Paris.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, there is a great deal in old Æsop's fable about the wolf that wanted to quarrel with the lamb. The wolf first undertook to quarrel with the lamb because it muddied the water in the stream where both were drinking, and then when the lamb established the fact that it had crossed the stream below where the wolf was, and that the water from which the wolf drank had gone by, there was still no peace made by the lamb with the wolf. There are legislative wolves, some of them partisan or personal enemies of the President, as well as wolves of the real sort.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Also lambs.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; also folks subject to the malice visited on that lamb. The Senator seems to take a little exception to the word "nagging," so perhaps we had better say "scolding." He says he is not complaining——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am not complaining.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He says he is not complaining and criticizing, so he seems to be principally scolding; and he goes about it in a very shrewd way, characteristic of my friend from Connecticut. He compares the Senate to a jury hearing a case. Of course, he knows that the Senate is no jury. What was his object in using that phrase, and then saying that the President was talking to "the individual members of the jury" after the case had been heard? He knew that the assumption that the Senate is a jury is unfounded in fact. His object was simply to leave an impression or to insinuate an impression that the President had been guilty of doing something highly improper and sinister, as would have been the case with a lawyer who argued a case before a jury and then had gone into the jury room or somewhere else and talked to individual jurors about the case. A lawyer who would have done that ought to have been disbarred.

While the Senator made no such assertion and did not say that the President was guilty of any improper act, he is one of the smartest men I have ever known in my life, and he weighed fully why he should use that analogy; and he could not have used it for any purpose except what I have stated. A man in the habit of blundering into things—in the habit of blundering and stumbling—might have done so, but there is no man in this body who knows better whither he wants to go and how he wants to get thither and why he wants to get there than does the Senator from Connecticut.

Let us take up some of these lesser things he said. The Constitution uses the words that the President shall do certain things "with the advice and consent of the Senate" in connection with two subjects matter. One is appointments to office and the other is the making of treaties. The Senator accuses, by statement or innuendo, the President of doing something wrong because he consults with a part of the Senate—individual Senators—and "advises and consults" with them as a part of the Senate, and says that his duty is to consult with none of them except when he consults with the whole Senate, and lays down the proposition that that is the constitutional duty of the President. In addition to the fact that if his statement were true every President of the United States would have been guilty of violating the Constitution, it is not a logical and correct conclusion. I remember, and the Senator himself will remember, that President McKinley sent for Senator after Senator and talked to them when the Spanish-American treaty was hanging in the balance in this body, and he did exactly right. He had a right to act "with the advice and consent" of the Members of the Senate constituting the Senate. When it comes to a matter of appointment Senators do not take the view of "advice and consent" announced by the Senator. When it comes to "the advice and consent of the Senate" with regard to treaties they say the President must come here to this whole body every time, that he can not use any argument to one that he would not use to another. And yet when it comes to appointments for office there is no Senator who is not perfectly willing to go to the White House upon his own motion and "advise and consult" with the President about the appointment, making his own argument in his own way without any resolution of the Senate as "a constitutional body." Why does he not carry the whole Senate with him to the White House every time he goes? Simply because it would be absurd and ridiculous and because nobody believes that there is any foundation for any sort of a position like that.

The Senator in another insinuation says the President in sending for these Senators "must be doing it for a purpose." Of course he is doing it for a purpose. Thomas Jefferson was doing it for a purpose when he sent for Randolph and others to consult with them about the treaty with France for the acquisition of Louisiana. McKinley was doing it for a purpose when he sent for them to obtain ratification by the Senate of the Spanish-American treaty annexing the Philippines and hanging in the balance, as I said a moment ago, with a difference of one or two votes at the time. Did any of us accuse him of doing an improper thing? What was the purpose? A foul purpose, an unworthy purpose? No; it was the purpose of consulting with the other "partner," as the Senator calls it, in the treaty-making power.

The only difference is that McKinley saw them in the interest of the accomplishment of a selfish national purpose of riveting to us and keeping a conquest, and Wilson has been seeing them in the interest of a broad world purpose of self-determination of the peoples and keeping that "peace on earth" which God blessed.

Mr. President, that is part of the duty of the President of the United States, and he is the sole judge of the manner in which he shall "consult and advise" with the Senate, whether in whole or part, because the Senate is nothing but a body of men made out of individual Senators.

At the beginning of this controversy some Senators were holding up the President to criticism, if not to obloquy, upon the ground that he would not and did not consult with Senators, that he went his way and paid no attention to the Senate, and not only did not appoint two or three self-denominated leading Senators as commissioners, so they could go to Paris and act under the limelight upon the great international arena, which was a fault, of course, but that he did not see them beforehand when he did things, and now they are criticizing him because he is seeing them after things have been done, not by him alone but by the five great leading powers and some score of other lesser powers.

Mr. President, I do not think that the President could any more satisfy five or six Senators in this body than that poor helpless lamb of Æsop's fable could have satisfied that other wolf. There is nothing the lamb could have said that would have satisfied the wolf, because what the wolf really wanted to do was to eat the lamb, and there is nothing the President could say to these Senators that would satisfy them, because their real purpose is to "eat him up," as the wolf said to Red Riding Hood; I mean politically, of course, because I do not charge them with being cannibals. But while they are "eating him up" they are eating up a part of their own country's honor, a part of their own country's prestige, and a part of their own country's weight in the councils of the nations of the earth.

Then the Senator says that because article 4 of this French-American treaty provides that these two treaties are to be submitted to the Senate for their consideration at the same time, therefore the President must in the same moment submit the two as indissolubly connected with one another and as virtually one instrument. He could not have done that if he wanted to. He would have had to submit one a few moments ahead of the other, anyhow, even if he was going to bring up both in the same speech. It is like saying that I do not give the Senate the benefit of my opinion because I started a speech this afternoon and the Senate takes a recess and I finish it on a different topic or subtopic to-morrow. These are not the same instrument. The agreement was not to submit them as the same instrument, but it was to submit them to the judgment and the sense of the Senate so that the Senate might at the same time have both of them under consideration. If the President submitted one last week and submits another one next week, all of us know that even if he shall do that the Senate will have both of them at the same time before it and under its consideration, considering one while not finished with consideration of the other. That is the common sense and the meaning of the obligation of the treaty in article 4. There is no other sense to be given to it unless it be from the standpoint of a narrow legalist.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. The Senator, of course, knows that the two treaties could have been laid before the Senate at the same time and that it need not have required five minutes more of the time of the President or any more of the time of the President to lay them before the Senate at the same time. Why was it not laid before the Senate? There must be some reason for it aside from the fact that the President wanted to make a long speech on the second treaty. What, in the opinion of the Senator, is the reason for it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the President might have laid the two treaties before the Senate on the same day. He could not have done it at the same time. He might have laid them before the Senate during the same week. He might lay them before the Senate in the same month; but provided the Senate has both of them at the same time before it for its consideration, the meaning of article 4 has been complied with. The Senator asks me to tell him why the President did what he did.

Mr. FALL. Yes; that is it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I can no more tell him why the President did this or that or the other than he can tell me, but I can venture a guess about it, which I imagine will be correct.

Mr. FALL. May I have the same privilege after the Senator concludes?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course; after I conclude you may have the floor.

Mr. FALL. I thank you.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

Mr WILLIAMS. Wait until I answer this question.

Mr. President, the only way you can judge other people is to judge them by yourself if in their place. If I had been President and had this to do I will tell you what would have led me to the course he pursued. I would have wanted time enough to explain this great league of nations and impress upon the Senate the importance of its adoption as a part of the great treaty of peace and to explain the treaty of peace itself, affecting the whole world, and I would not have wanted to take up so very long a time as would have tired and bored the Senate in a speech so long that the country would not have read it. I would, therefore, have taken up that question first; I would have put it before the Senate, and later, the next day or the next week or the next month, before that had been disposed of by the Senate and while it was still being considered by the Senate, I would have taken up the other and addressed myself to that in another short address, so that I would again not have run the risk of boring and exhausting the patience of the United States Senate and missing the concentrated attention of the people on the second subject matter.

And another reason: I would have wanted the country to receive the full impress of my reasons for advocating the ratification of the one treaty separately from the confusion that might have come about from presenting both issues at the same time. They are not parts of the same instrument, but are two separate instruments.

That is my answer to the Senator; but I can not tell him, of course, what actuated the President. I can only tell him what would have actuated me, just as he could tell the Senate what would have actuated him.

Mr. President, I will yield the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, some days ago I gave notice that at the conclusion of the morning business to-day I would submit to the Senate some remarks touching the provisions in the treaty of peace relating to what is called Shantung. I did not anticipate then that the morning business would be deferred for the discussion of general topics and for the discussion of a treaty of peace that is not before the Senate and that has not been submitted to the Senate by the President. I desire to say now that I will object to the transaction of any further business than the business which is regularly in order and that I will ask the indulgence of the Senate to proceed with my remarks as soon as the morning business has been concluded.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a communication from the National Women's Trade Union League of America, transmitting resolutions adopted in convention at Philadelphia, Pa., favoring the passage of the so-called civil-service retirement bill, the reclassification of salaries of Government employees, the system of savings by war-savings certificates and thrift stamps, the repeal of the law granting preference to discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines in the matter of Federal employment, and the passage of the proposed minimum-wage bill, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Supreme Council of the Mystic Order of Veiled Prophets of the Enchanted Realm, of Hamilton, N. Y., pledging their loyalty and allegiance to our flag and country, and favoring the enactment of legislation prohibiting the display of any flag not subservient to the Stars and Stripes, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. NEWBERRY (for Mr. TOWNSEND) presented a petition of Local Union No. 235, National Federation of Postal Employees, of Battle Creek, Mich., and a petition of sundry postal employees of Port Huron, Mich., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also (for Mr. TOWNSEND) presented petitions of sundry citizens of Michigan, praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also (for Mr. TOWNSEND) presented petitions of sundry citizens of Charlotte, Lapeer, and Flint, all in the State of Michigan, praying for the repeal of the so-called "luxury" tax, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also (for Mr. TOWNSEND) presented a memorial of the Ministers' Conference of Grand Rapids, Mich., remonstrating against the repeal of war-time and national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also (for Mr. TOWNSEND) presented a petition of Local Union No. 10, Bricklayers, Masons, and Plasterers' International Union, of Albion, Mich., and a petition of Local Union No. 22, Cigarmakers' International Union of America, of Detroit, Mich., praying for the exemption from prohibition of 2¾ per cent beer, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PAGE presented a memorial of sundry citizens of St. Johnsbury, Vt., and a memorial of sundry citizens of Pittsford, Vt., remonstrating against the establishment of a Department of Education, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts presented memorials of employees of the Lincoln Twist Drill Co., of Taunton; of the Paris Paper Co., of the Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Co., of the Lamson Co., of Boston; of Dodd & Williams, of Boston; of the Mountain Mill Paper Co., of Lee; of the Plimpton Press, of Norwood; of the Durable Wire Rope Co., of the Royal Curtain Manufacturing Co., of the Brown-Wales Co., of Ginn & Co., of Boston; of the Northeastern Leather Co., of the Cronkhite Co., of H. PERIODICALS NOT PRINTED IN ENGLISH.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I introduce a bill and I ask that it be read at length.

The bill (S. 2604) to prohibit the use of the mails by periodicals and newspapers not printed in English, and for other purposes, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after October 1, 1919, it shall be unlawful to send through the mails any periodical or newspaper or publication in the shape of a pamphlet or circular printed in a foreign language which does not contain a translation into English, column for column and page for page, of such publication.

SEC. 2. That from and after January 1, 1925, it shall be unlawful to send through the mails any periodical or newspaper or publication in the shape of a pamphlet or circular which is printed in any language other than English.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the post-office officials to seize any publication sought to be sent through the mails in violation of the provisions of this act, and any person convicted of delivering any such publication to be sent in violation of the provisions of this act shall on conviction be punished with fine not to exceed $1,000 or with imprisonment not to exceed one year, one or both, in the discretion of the judge hearing the case.

SEC. 4. That all laws or parts of laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

TREATY WITH FRANCE.

Mr. LODGE. I offer the following resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 132) was read, as follows:

Whereas the President of the United States, in his address in the United States Senate on July 10, 1919, stated, as it appears on page 2339 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

"I shall presently have occasion to lay before you a special treaty with France, whose object is the temporary protection of France from unprovoked aggression by the power with whom this treaty of peace has been negotiated. Its terms link it with this treaty. I take the liberty, however, of reserving it, because of its importance, for special explication on another occasion;" and

Whereas said proposed treaty with France has been submitted to the Chamber of Deputies of the French Republic; and

Whereas a purported transcript of said treaty has been printed in a public journal in this country and appears in this day's RECORD of the proceedings of the Senate; and

Whereas article 4 of said treaty provides that "the present treaty will be submitted to the Senate of the United States at the same time as the treaty of Versailles is submitted to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification:" Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the President is hereby respectfully requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the Senate the said proposed treaty with France, to the end that the Senate may consider said treaty in connection with the treaty of peace with Germany.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. ROBINSON. I object to the present consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It goes over.

THE MEAT-PACKING INDUSTRY.

Mr. KENYON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 134), which was read and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed 7,000 copies of the Report of the Federal Trade Commission on the Meat-Packing Industry Summary, and Part I, Extent and Growth of Power of the Five Packers in Meat and Other Industries, 2,000 to be delivered to the Senate, 3,000 to the House of Representatives, and 2,000 to the Federal Trade Commission.

PRICES OF CATTLE AND SWINE.

Mr. HARRIS. I submit a resolution and ask that it be read and lie over under the rule.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 133), as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission be, and it is hereby, directed to make an immediate investigation of the methods of purchase and prices paid for cattle and swine by persons and corporations engaged in the meat-packing industry, with particular reference to the discriminations, if any, operating to the disadvantage of live-stock producers in the Southern States, and to report as soon as practicable to the Senate the results of such investigation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over and be printed.

OFFICIAL REPORTERS OF DEBATES.

Mr. SMOOT submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 135), which was read and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That Theodore F. Shuey and James W. Murphy are hereby appointed official reporters for reporting the proceedings and debates of the Senate until further order of the Senate, subject to all the duties and obligations of the contract made with D. F. Murphy, deceased, late reporter of the Senate, and to the supervision and control of the Committee on Printing on behalf of the Senate in all respects therein provided, and to receive payment for such service according to law.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 3754. An act to amend sections 8 and 21 of the copyright act approved March 4, 1909, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Patents.

PEACE AND THE LEAGUE.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I have here a brief editorial from the Twin City Reporter, an independent paper of wide circulation, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PEACE AND THE LEAGUE.

"Peace has come!

"The league of nations is born!

"Hail the league!

"And look out for squalls.

"China, the yellow giant of the East, refused point-blank to sign the treaty. Discord No. 1.

"If the United States Congress refuses to sanction our entrance into the league, there will be discord No. 2.

"If it does, there will be discord No. 3.

"It's pretty much a case of 'be damned if you do and be damned if you don't.'

"The empty platitudes that have been wafted over the cables and over the wires anent the new-born freedom, the self-determination of races and peoples, will fall far short of bringing such peace to the world as the world desires.

"Ireland isn't feeling at all peaceful. Korea is far from being in a mood to pamper the pigeon of peace. China, with its 400,000,000 population, isn't clapping hands for joy. India, groaning under the weight of famine and war taxes, can't see the spot where we are told all eyes should focus. And so it is all over the world.

"The trouble lies not with the peace that has been made—not that it has been made—but in the manner of making it.

"The people—the citizenry—of no country have been consulted. The world was at war with Germany. Instead of making a peace with our enemy, we have embroiled the world in a league of nations. Instead of making peace with Germany, we have made enemies of half the world. Instead of one enemy, we will have a score. Instead of having one army of occupation, we will have to have a half dozen armies ready to become armies of occupation. And they tell us that the league of nations will bring a lasting peace to the world!

"The world wanted peace. We wanted peace. The world didn't want a league of nations. We didn't want it.

"The world had nothing to say about it. We will have nothing to say about it.

"A few old men met last winter in Paris, France. For months they argued and wrangled. The 'pitiless publicity' and 'open diplomacy' so valiantly promised failed to materialize. The 'home folks' were graciously permitted to guess at what was being done—they were never told.

"A league of nations plan was proposed by and agreed to among the old men. The 'home folks' weren't consulted. They were told just what the old men wanted to tell them, which wasn't much.

"But, among other things, they were told that the league of nations plan would make future wars impossible. Did the old men believe this? They did not.

"And because they did not, they agreed to enter into agreements among themselves.

"The world doesn't know to-day how many of these agreements were entered into. The world will not know until another war threatens. It will plod along under the obsession that the league of nations will prevent all wars. And then some day it will wake up to find that one of the private agreements entered into by the old men will supersede the league of nations plan. And there will be war and—an end to the league.

"The man in whose brain the idea of the league was formed signed the treaty under protest. Smuts, the Boer, protested but signed. It was his mind that first mapped out the present league plan. But at that the plan wasn't original. It has been tried out times innumerable and with always the same result—

"Failure!

"The old men whose hands held the power to bring forth the league knew the league would not, could not, prevent wars, so they endeavored to protect themselves by entering into other agreements. If the league were capable of protecting the human race from the red wave of war there would have been no need of these secret agreements.

"The ones who are so staunch in their support of the league of nations plan have evidently overlooked this fact.

"We have entered into an agreement to protect France from attack—from an 'unprovoked' attack by Germany—and Germany bled white and torn by internal strife, bankrupt, and impotent to govern herself!

"If there was anything in the league of nations plan that would prevent war, why was it necessary to enter into a separate agreement to protect France?

"If the nations of the world were to have 'self-determination'—the right to choose their own form of government, the right to enjoy national liberty—then why deny Ireland, Egypt, Korea, India, and the scores of other small nations and races that right?

"'What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander.' If the right of self-government—the right of self-determination—is the right of one nation, one race, one people, it is the right of all!

"If we turn the picture of Ireland with its 'face toward the wall,' if we throw up our hands when Korea pleads for national independence, if we roll our eyes in horror when India pleads for the right of self-government, what right have we to prattle of a self-determination for any race or people?

"If we enter into an agreement that Japan shall have and hold a part of the Chinese Empire-Republic's territory, what right have we to babble of a world freedom or a world democracy?

"But we have peace. The treaty has been signed. War with Germany has officially ended.

"With the coming of peace cometh the league of nations.

"Hail the league!

"And look out for squalls."

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Monday next, if an opportunity is afforded, I will address the Senate in reply to certain charges that have been made against Senate bill 1017, and especially to certain charges made in the baccalaureate address delivered on the 15th of June last at Georgetown University.

Mr. NORRIS. What is the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is the bill to create a department of education.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

JAPANESE INTERESTS IN CHINA.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the treaty of peace which has been submitted to the Senate by the President and is now under consideration by the Committee on Foreign Relations is perhaps the most voluminous document of its character that has ever been written. It is not surprising that a number of provisions in this treaty should have been the subject of serious criticism. No question connected with the peace treaty has occasioned more discussion in the Senate and in the press than those which relate to what we know, somewhat inaccurately, as "Shantung."

The provisions in the treaty of peace respecting Japanese claims in Kiaochow have been the subject of serious criticism. Undoubtedly the controversy is associated with difficulties and confusion sufficient to justify differences of opinion among those who are disposed to give fair consideration to its terms and its effect. These provisions, however, have been repeatedly misinterpreted in the debates in the Senate and are, I believe, quite generally misunderstood. It is my purpose in addressing the Senate to-day to set forth what I believe to be the facts pertinent to a fair understanding of this controversy, and to relieve it from uncertainties and confusion resulting from erroneous and exaggerated statements calculated to arouse prejudice in the Senate and in the country.

MUTUAL CONFIDENCE THE BASIS OF AMITY BETWEEN NATIONS.

The discussion by the Senate of the peace treaty in open executive session meets with general approval. Reciprocal courtesy and confidence are the basis of amicable relations between nations. The history of the Japanese claims in Shantung does not justify the violent attacks on Japan which have occurred in the course of the debate in this body. I shall assume that good faith underlies the motives of all nations associated with this Government in the conduct of the war and shall refrain from intemperate criticisms of the policy or purposes of other nations.

The language in the treaty germane to the subject is contained in articles 156 to 158, inclusive. Germany renounces in favor of Japan all rights, titles, and privileges, including leased territory, railways, mines, and submarine cables in the Kiaochow region. The language of the treaty is as follows:

SECTION VIII.

SHANTUNG.

Article 156.

Germany renounces, in favor of Japan, all her rights, title, and privileges—particularly those concerning the territory of Kiaochow, railways, mines, and submarine cables—which she acquired in virtue of the treaty concluded by her with China on March 6, 1898, and of all other arrangements relative to the Province of Shantung.

All German rights in the Tsingtao-Tsinanfu Railway, including its branch lines, together with its subsidiary property of all kinds, stations, shops, fixed and rolling stock, mines, plant, and material for the exploitation of the mines, are and remain acquired by Japan, together with all rights and privileges attaching thereto.

The German State submarine cables from Tsingtao to Shanghai and from Tsingtao to Chefoo, with all the rights, privileges, and properties attaching thereto, are similarly acquired by Japan free and clear of all charges and encumbrances.

Article 157.

The movable and immovable property owned by the German State in the territory of Kiaochow, as well as all the rights which Germany might claim in consequence of the works or improvements made or of the expenses incurred by her, directly or indirectly, in connection with this territory, are and remain acquired by Japan free and clear of all charges and encumbrances.

Article 158.

Germany shall hand over to Japan within three months from the coming into force of the present treaty the archives, registers, plans, title deeds, and documents of every kind, wherever they may be, relating to the administration, whether civil, military, financial, judicial, or other, of the territory of Kiaochow.

Within the same period Germany shall give particulars to Japan of all treaties, arrangements, or agreements relating to the rights, title, or privileges referred to in the two preceding articles.

It is apparent that, in so far as the treaty is concerned, Japan's rights in Kiaochow are limited to only such territory, properties, and privileges as Germany possessed there.

ORIGIN OF GERMANY'S CLAIMS.

Little dispute arises as to the origin of Germany's claims.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the statement which the Senator from Arkansas is making is one that has very great importance to the Senate itself and it ought to be understood. I think I am justified in making a point of no quorum, because the Shantung matter ought to be thoroughly understood by the Senate. Therefore I make the point of no quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield for the purpose?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harrison	Moses	Shields
Ball	Henderson	Myers	Simmons
Bankhead	Hitchcock	New	Smith, Ariz.
Capper	Johnson, S. Dak.	Newberry	Smith, S. C.
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Smoot
Curtis	Kellogg	Overman	Spencer
Dial	Kenyon	Owen	Sterling
Edge	King	Page	Sutherland
Fletcher	Kirby	Phelan	Thomas
Gay	La Follette	Phipps	Trammell
Gerry	Lenroot	Pittman	Walsh, Mass.
Hale	Lodge	Pomerene	Walsh, Mont.
Harding	McKellar	Robinson	Warren
Harris	McNary	Sheppard

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, before the call of the Senate was ordered I had stated somewhat in detail that among the many provisions contained in the treaty of peace now under consideration by the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate none had been the occasion of more discussion and of greater misunderstanding than the effect of the treaty respecting Japan's relations to Kiaochow. I had also stated that it is my object in the remarks which I shall submit to the Senate to attempt to state the true facts regarding the matter.

The years 1897 and 1898 marked an epoch in Chinese history. The great powers—Great Britain, France, Russia, and Japan—were seeking concessions from the Chinese Government and threatening aggression in Chinese territory. This combined pressure for concessions aroused strong antiforeign sentiment throughout China and culminated in the Boxer rebellion of 1900 and the promulgation by the United States, with the approval of Great Britain, of the "open-door policy."

OPEN-DOOR POLICY DEFINED.

The "open-door policy" asserted the right of all nations to equal commercial rights in China and the preservation of Chinese territory from aggression by any power.

The Boxer rebellion manifested the antiforeign sentiment of China by attacks on the legations of the various powers. The rebellion was suppressed by the combined efforts of France, Great Britain, Germany, Russia, Japan, and the United States. The "open-door policy" was concurred in by the various nations. China became suspicious of the good faith of all governments seeking concessions.

As a part of the movement of the nations mentioned to secure concessions in China, Germany in 1896 undertook negotiations for rights and privileges in the Kiaochow region. These negotiations were unsuccessful. In the following year, 1897, justifying her action as a punitive measure against China for the murder of two missionaries by residents of Shantung, Germany dispatched a naval fleet to the Bay of Kiaochow and took possession of its port, Tsingtau.

SOVEREIGN RIGHTS SECURED TO GERMANY BY TREATY OF MARCH 6, 1898.

March 6, 1898, Germany concluded a treaty with China by which she acquired a lease for 99 years of both sides of the entrance to the Bay of Kiaochow. There is some confusion as to the area of this leased territory. The representative of the National Geographic Society declares that it consists of only 123 square miles, whereas other authorities assert that the total land and water area leased is approximately 400 square miles.

A zone of 50 kilometers (a little more than 30 miles in width) surrounding the Bay of Kiaochow, designated by many writers as a neutral zone, was also created. China reserved the rights of sovereignty over this zone, but granted free passage through it to German troops and also extended other privileges in the zone to the German Government. China expressly agreed to abstain from the exercise of any sovereign rights in the ceded territory and agreed to the exercise of the same by Germany.

It has been stated by more than one Senator that by the treaty Shantung with its 40,000,000 inhabitants is wrested from China and presented to Japan. Shantung is a little larger than either Iowa or Wisconsin. It has a total area of 55,984 square miles and a population estimated at 40,000,000.

The territory involved in this controversy is limited to a small land area of approximately 200 square miles and an equal water area. The population of Tsingtau in 1914 was estimated at 34,000. The total population of the leased area is approximately 200,000. This is one illustration of the inexcusable misrepresentations which have characterized the discussion of the subject.

Only a small portion of Shantung, embracing but 200,000 inhabitants, is involved, and yet critics of the treaty declare that the whole of Shantung, with its 40,000,000 people, is taken from China and given to Japan.

The confusion respecting the rights of sovereignty as defined by the treaty between China and Germany arises from a failure to distinguish between the neutral zone and the ceded territory, which embraced, according to what I believe the best authorities, a land area of 208 square miles and a water area consisting of the entire Bay of Kiaochow, of approximately 200 square miles more.

China agreed that Germany might construct two railways and operate mines within about 10 miles of the lines, one of which was to extend from Tsingtau to Tsinganfu, a distance of 250 miles.

Let me call attention now to the terms of the treaty, which make clear the distinction between the ceded territory and the neutral zone, and which also define or throw light upon the rights of sovereignty as expressed in the treaty:

ARTICLE 1. His Majesty the Emperor of China, guided by the intention to strengthen the friendly relations between China and Germany, and at the same time to increase the military readiness of the Chinese Empire, engages, while reserving to himself all rights of sovereignty in a zone of 50 kilometers (100 Chinese li) surrounding the Bay of Kiaochow at high water, to permit the free passage of German troops within this zone at any time, as also to abstain from taking any measures or issuing any ordinances therein without the previous consent of the German Government, and especially to place no obstacle in the way of any regulation of the watercourses which may prove to be necessary.

Thus you will see that while by article 1 China reserved the rights of sovereignty in the zone, she agreed that as to the zone she would not exercise that right in the making of ordinances except with the consent of the German Government. That relates solely to the status of the zone.

His Majesty the Emperor of China at the same time reserves to himself the right to station troops within that zone, in agreement with the German Government, and to take other military measures.

Thus by article 1 the zone already mentioned was created, and as to this zone China reserved the rights of sovereignty, but granted to Germany free passage of troops and the regulation of watercourses.

ART. 2. With the intention of meeting the legitimate desire of His Majesty the German Emperor that Germany, like other powers, should hold a place on the Chinese coast for the repair and equipment of her ships, for the storage of provisions and materials for the same, and for other arrangements connected therewith, His Majesty the Emperor of China cedes to Germany on lease provisionally for 99 years both sides of the entrance of the Bay of Kiaochow. Germany engages to construct, at a suitable moment, on the territory thus ceded, fortifications for the protection of the buildings to be constructed there and of the entrance to the harbor.

By article 3 China agrees to abstain from exercising rights of sovereignty in the ceded territory and leaves the exercise of the same to Germany. The language is as follows:

ARTICLE 3.

In order to avoid the possibility of conflicts, the Imperial Chinese Government will abstain from exercising rights of sovereignty in the ceded territory during the term of the lease and leaves the exercise of the same to Germany within the following limits:

1. On the northern side of the entrance to the bay:

The peninsular bounded to the northeast by a line drawn from the northeastern corner of Potato Island to Loshan Harbor.

2. On the southern side of the entrance to the bay:

The peninsular bounded to the southwest of a line drawn from the southwesternmost point of the bay lying to the south-southwest of Chiposan Island in the direction of Tolosan Island.

3. The island of Chiposan and Potato Island.

4. The whole water area of the bay up to the highest watermark at present known.

5. All islands lying seaward from Kiaochow Bay which may be of importance for its defense, such as Tolosan, Chalienchow, etc.

The high contracting parties reserve to themselves to delimitate more accurately, in accord with local traditions, the boundaries of the territory leased to Germany and of the 50-kilometer zone around the bay, by means of commissioners to be appointed by both sides.

Pursuant to that last clause, the territory leased was delimitated. I have had made the best map that is obtainable respecting the subject. The exterior boundary of the leased territory, as finally delimitated, is a somewhat irregular line, the greater portion of the land area being to the right of the bay entering it. The city of Tsingtau is embraced within the leased territory. Outside of the leased territory, and as distinct from it as two subjects can be, is the so-called neutral zone, approximately 30 miles in width. The interior boundary of the neutral zone is more or less irregular, being the exterior boundary of the ceded territory.

Thus it appears that as to the zone qualified sovereignty was reserved in China, subject to certain German rights and privileges, while as to the ceded territory China expressly agrees to abstain from exercising rights of sovereignty and leaves the exercise of the same to Germany.

The right of Germany to exercise sovereignty in the ceded territory is made obligatory by the provision:

The Chinese population dwelling in the ceded territory shall at all times enjoy the protection of the German Government.

And so forth.

That sovereignty over the water area of the bay was vested in Germany is conclusively shown by the language:

Chinese ships in the bay shall not be subject to any restrictions other than those which the Imperial German Government, in virtue of the rights of sovereignty over the whole of the water area of the bay transferred to Germany, may at any time find it necessary to impose with regard to ships of other nations.

What clearer proof of sovereign rights in Germany could appear than these express provisions recognizing absolute rights of sovereignty in the ceded territory, including both the land and the water areas?

The language:

As regards the establishment of Chinese custom stations which formerly existed outside the ceded territory but within the 50-kilometer zone, the Imperial German Government intends to come to an agreement with the Chinese Government—and so forth, shows the plain distinction between sovereignty in the zone and sovereignty in the ceded territory.

The declaration made during debates in the Senate that no sovereign rights passed from China to Germany by the treaty and the statement also made in the Senate and elsewhere that all sovereign rights were reserved by China is contradicted by the express language and plain implications of the treaty itself.

LEGAL EFFECT OF THE TREATY.

It is asserted by critics of the treaty that the compact between Germany and China is of such a nature that the declaration of war against Germany by China had the effect of abrogating its provisions and restoring to China all rights which she had granted to Germany. Passing over for later consideration the agreement of China to any arrangement which Japan might make with Germany respecting these rights, which agreement with Japan was made before China declared war, let us consider whether even in the absence of any such agreement with Japan the declaration of war by China would have terminated German rights.

No exact precedent can be cited for the reason that the convention of March 6, 1898, in which China leased Kiaochow to Germany and granted her sovereign rights within the leased territory is the first instance in which the effect of such a treaty has arisen.

An examination of the provisions of the treaty shows that while the lease is for 99 years Germany is vested with the exclusive right of government during that period, both as to the water area and the land area leased. Germany, without doubt, had the power and the right to establish a military and a naval base in the leased territory. She would probably have done this and she would have conducted military and naval operations from Tsingtau if Japan had not rendered this impossible by driving the Germans out.

While the outbreak of war canceled political treaties of a temporary nature between the belligerents it would seem that such a treaty as that between China and Germany, in which China agreed to accept the status of other nations with which Germany was at peace, in so far as the leased territory is concerned, would not be abrogated ipso facto by the outbreak of war between China and Germany. At least, it may be asserted that the status of the leased territory was such that Germany actually anticipated attack there by the Allies while China remained neutral.

JAPAN'S CLAIMS.

That Germany regarded her rights in Shantung as subject to seizure by the allied nations at war with her is disclosed by her efforts to anticipate their occupation of the leased territory. Prior to the attack by Japan, Germany made frantic efforts to effect a temporary transfer of the leased territory and the railways to some neutral power other than China. This attempt on the part of Germany to preserve her rights in Kiaochow was closely followed by the action of Japan, with the knowledge and approval of France and England, in sending to Germany the ultimatum of August 15, 1917, demanding that Germany relinquish the leased territory and abandon all claims in China. Undoubtedly Japan acted from the beginning in concert with the enemies of Germany.

When Germany refused the ultimatum, Japan, on August 23, declared war on Germany, and immediately blockaded Tsingtau. Having seized the railway line and established a base at Laushan, on the border of the leased territory, Japan laid siege to the garrison of 4,600 German troops with an army of 20,000, and after two months' hostilities received the surrender of Tsingtau. She has remained in possession of the leased territory and of the German property from the fall of Tsingtau, November 7, 1914, until the present.

When Japan attacked Germany in Kiaochow, China created a war zone embracing the area of actual hostilities. Some months after the surrender of the Germans to Japan, China announced that this war zone would be abolished. Japan thereupon submitted to China the 21 demands, some of which related to Kiaochow, and after protracted negotiations the Chinese Government agreed to recognize any settlement which Japan might make with Germany upon the restoration of peace respecting the rights, interests, and concessions possessed by Germany in the Province of Shantung.

The treaty concluded May 25, 1915, in so far as it relates to the subject under discussion, is as follows:

TREATY RESPECTING THE PROVINCE OF SHANTUNG.

(Signed at Peking May 25, 1915.)

His Majesty the Emperor of Japan and His Excellency the President of the Republic of China, being desirous to maintain the general peace of the Far East and to further strengthen the relations of amity and good neighborhood existing between the two countries, have resolved to conclude a treaty for that purpose, and to that end have named their plenipotentiaries; that is to say:

His Majesty the Emperor of Japan, Mr. Eki Hioki, Jushii, second class of the Imperial Order of the Sacred Treasure; His Majesty's envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the Republic of China, Mr. Lu Cheng-Hsiang, Chung-Ching, first class of the Order of Chia-Ho,

Who, after having communicated to each other their respective full powers, which were found to be in good and due form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ART. 1. The Chinese Government engage to recognize all matters that may be agreed upon between the Japanese Government and the German Government respecting the disposition of all the rights, interests, and concessions which, in virtue of treaties or otherwise, Germany possesses vis-à-vis China in relation to the Province of Shantung.

ART. 2. The Chinese Government engage that, in case they undertake the construction of a railway connecting Chefoo or Lungkow with the Kiaochow-Tsinan Railway, they shall, in the event of Germany's surrendering her right of providing capital for the Chefoo-Weihsien railway line, enter into negotiations with Japanese capitalists for the purpose of financing the said undertaking.

ART. 3. The Chinese Government engage to open of their own accord, as early as possible, suitable cities and towns in the Province of Shantung for the residence and trade of foreigners.

ART. 4. The present treaty shall take effect on the day of its signature.

The present treaty shall be ratified by His Majesty the Emperor of Japan and by His Excellency the President of the Republic of China, and the ratifications thereof shall be exchanged at Tokyo as soon as possible.

In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty, made in duplicate in Japanese and in Chinese, and have hereunto affixed their seals.

Done at Peking the 25th day of the fifth month of the fourth year of Taisho, corresponding to the 25th day of the fifth month of the fourth year of the inauguration of the Republic of China.

Etc., Etc., Etc.

[SEAL.] (Signed) LU CHENG-HSIANG,
Etc., Etc., Etc.

Concurrently with the execution of the treaty a note was issued by the Japanese minister at Peking by which Japan agreed, if given at the close of the war free disposal of the leased territory at Kiaochow Bay, to return the leased territory upon four conditions. This note is as follows:

PEKING, May 25, 1915.

MONSIEUR LE MINISTRE: In the name of the Imperial Government I have the honor to make the following declaration to your excellency's Government:

If upon the conclusion of the present war the Japanese Government should be given an absolutely free disposal of the leased territory of Kiaochow Bay, they will return the said leased territory to China subject to the following conditions:

1. Opening of the whole of Kiaochow as commercial port.
2. Establishment of a Japanese settlement in the locality to be designated by the Japanese Government.
3. Establishment, if desired by the powers, of an international settlement.
4. Arrangements to be made before the return of the said territory is effected between the Japanese and Chinese Governments with respect to the disposal of German public establishments and properties and with regard to the other conditions and procedures.

I avail, etc.,

(Signed) EKI HIOKI,
Japanese Minister at Peking.

His excellency Mr. LU CHENG-HSIANG,
Chinese Minister for Foreign Affairs.

(Mr. Lu Cheng-Hsiang is now head of Chinese delegation at Paris.)

Thus is appears that Japan first obtained possession of the ceded territory and of the German properties by act of war, and while in possession of the same secured the agreement of China to recognize any settlement which she might make with Germany upon the restoration of peace.

Subsequent events establish the fact that Japan, having wrested by force from Germany the rights and properties of whatever nature Germany acquired from China by the treaty of March, 1898, and having secured China's agreement to recognize a cession of these rights and properties from Germany, Japan negotiated with her allies, England, France, and Russia, to secure their promise to support her claims to German rights in Shantung.

JAPAN WILL RESTORE TERRITORY TO CHINA.

The United States, through the Lansing-Ishii notes, agreed that Japan, by reason of her proximity to China, has special interests there. By the Lansing-Ishii agreement Japan unqualifiedly recognizes the right of China to territorial integrity. Japanese statesmen have repeatedly reaffirmed the purpose to return the ceded territory to China as soon as it can be accomplished in accordance with the provisions of the agreement between China and Japan. There can be no doubt that Japan is bound by every consideration of honor and by executory obligations of unmistakable import to return this territory to China.

Viscount Uchidi, Japanese minister of foreign affairs, in an address on January 21, 1919, stated that Kiaochow would be returned to China in accordance with the terms of the agreement on May 25, 1915.

Baron S. Goto, former minister of foreign affairs for Japan, made the same statement in New York May 6, 1919.

The Associated Press reports from Paris, April 30, 1919, are to the same effect.

Baron Makino, one of the Japanese peace delegates, confirmed this purpose on the part of Japan to restore the ceded territory in an interview on April 30, 1919.

The Japanese ambassador issued the following statement:

[From the New York World, May 16, 1919.]

ISHII SAYS JAPAN FAVORS OPEN CHINA—AMBASSADOR ALSO DECLARES HIS NATION AND UNITED STATES HAVE NO CONFLICT IN INTERESTS, DESPITE TONE OF PRESS.

WASHINGTON, May 15.

"I am an optimist about the relations between Japan and the United States, whatever may be the tone of the press, because there is no real conflict of interest."

This statement was authorized to-day by Viscount Ishii, the Japanese ambassador. The ambassador said Japan is in hearty accord with America on the principle of the open door and equal opportunity, not only in China but in Siberia also.

Discussing the relations between Japan and the United States, Viscount Ishii said:

"The only important question now is especially in regard to the so-called Shantung question. The best way to treat this question is to expose before the American public the true facts of the case, as the facts explain themselves.

EXPLANATION OF SHANTUNG.

"In 1898 China granted to Germany a 99-year leasehold on Kiaochow, in the Province of Shantung. The lease included the Bay of Kiaochow and its surrounding district, together with mining concessions along the Tsingtau-Tsinan Railway, which railway also was granted to Germany. Thus Germany acquired from China two kinds of concessions: First, the territorial leasehold, and, second, some concessions of an economic character.

"After Japan had driven the Germans from the Shantung Peninsula, following a two months' siege, Japan took the initiative and offered to surrender to China the German leasehold upon the transfer to Japan by right of conquest of the said leased territory being consented to by Germany in the peace conference. Japan's voluntary offer to restore it to China, was, of course, of the greatest advantage to China, as China was entirely powerless to recover by her own means her territorial sovereignty in Shantung for 75 years more.

WAS MOST ADVANTAGEOUS.

"The treaty of 1915 placed China in a position to recover this important advantage without sacrificing either blood or treasure. Therefore, the treaty of 1915 was not an unfair transaction, but was exceptionally advantageous from China's point of view. So far as the territorial integrity of China is concerned, it is for these reasons entirely in favor of China.

"There remains a second kind of concession, the economic concession, which Japan was to retain in her hands as in the days of German occupation. Here again Japan's good will toward China went so far as to offer to withdraw her civil and military administration from the railway zone by withdrawing troops and police forces and making the Tsingtau-Tsinan Railway a joint enterprise of Japan and China instead of an absolutely foreign administration, as it was under German occupation.

"When Japan took possession of Kiaochow by force of arms in 1914, China remained neutral. Japan's action in Shantung even met with protest from China. Since November, 1914, Japan has occupied Kiaochow and the railway zone from that port to Tsinan, the capital of the Province, by right of conquest. Three years afterwards—namely, in 1917—China declared war against Germany. But the declaration of war remained on paper only, there being no German forces in China then, and China having sent none of her forces abroad. China's declaration of war could not possibly change the state of things which has existed since 1914."

Mr. POMERENE. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Arkansas has referred to the proposition which was made by the Japanese Government to the Chinese Government, I think, in 1915.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. POMERENE. He has also referred to promises which have been made since that time not only by Japanese statesmen publicly but to a statement which was made by the Japanese commissioners to the other peace commissioners whereby they promised the return of this territory under the terms and conditions to which the Senator has referred.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The treaty of 1915.

Mr. POMERENE. I say that preliminary to asking the question: Has any peace commission ever made any statement to the contrary or has any Japanese statesman ever made any statement to the contrary or is there any information to the effect that Japan does not intend to carry out these pledges which she has made?

Mr. ROBINSON. It would be impossible, Mr. President, for me to say that no statement has ever been made by any Japanese statesman contrary to the statement which I have read. Okuma is reputed to have made a statement at one time relating to the rights which Japan claimed by virtue of having taken this territory and property from Germany, in which it was asserted that he had denied there was any obligation upon the part of Japan to return the territory. I have not that statement. That related solely to the claim of Japan independent of the treaty and based on conquest.

If China insists upon breaching the treaty herself—the treaty under which she has a right to the return of the property—Japan will be compelled either to abandon her claims there or to rely upon her alleged conquest. If China breaches the treaty by which Japan voluntarily agreed to return the leased territory, China, of course, can not insist upon a return of the territory under the treaty which she herself breaches.

I will now continue the statements made by Japanese statesmen touching the purpose of Japan to carry out the obligations of the treaty of 1915, if permitted to do so.

The Marquis Kimmochi Saionji, in an interview published in the Outlook in 1919, said:

Japan has solemnly promised to give back the leased territory of Kiaochow and to restore Shantung to China in full sovereignty, except a little land at Tsingtao for establishing a Japanese settlement, and Japan will keep her word. I do not need to defend that word from any innuendo. Japan has always kept her international agreements and her honor is above reproach.

The statement by Mr. Debuchi, chargé d'affaires, published with comments by Mr. Oliver Owen Kuhn in a recent issue of the Washington Evening Star, is fairly illustrative of the Japanese viewpoint concerning this subject:

CHINA RESTORATION WITHIN SIX MONTHS HOPE OF JAPANESE—SHANTUNG SETTLEMENT CERTAINLY NOT LATER THAN YEAR, SAYS KATSUJI DEBUCHI—NIPPON SEEKS TO WORK WITH UNITED STATES IN FAR EAST—CHARGÉ D'AFFAIRES OF WASHINGTON EMBASSY DISCUSSES POSITION AND DESIRES OF HIS COUNTRY IN SHANTUNG.

(By Oliver Owen Kuhn.)

That Japan, if not within a period of six months, will be able perhaps within one year to comply with the treaty provision with China and restore Kiaochow and all heretofore German-controlled territory in Shantung to China, is the opinion of Katsuji Debuchi, chargé d'affaires of the Japanese Embassy in Washington.

In elaboration of Japan's position in Shantung, Mr. Debuchi, who has been carrying the burden of embassy affairs since the departure of Ambassador Ishii, made it clear that he has no desire to enter denials of charges made by the Chinese for the mere sake of waging propaganda in the interest of Japan, because some of his best friends are Chinese statesmen of note. Neither did he wish to be placed in position of replying directly to the charges which have been made by certain Members of the Senate in regard to far eastern affairs. He simply desired to make the truth of the Shantung situation known to the American people, for, with the truth known, much of the criticism now directed against Japan might disappear. Mr. Debuchi was for a long period connected with the Chinese division of the Japanese foreign office and served in high official position at the Japanese legation in Peking. He is thoroughly conversant with the cross tides of Chinese political affairs and the international complications that have arisen in far eastern events, particularly as they bear upon the relations of Japan and China.

WANTS ONLY GOOD RELATIONS.

"There is a will of providence," he said, "in the relations between the United States, Japan, and China, all washed by the same waters of the Pacific. Japan desires nothing more than perpetuation of the good relationships between our country and the United States. We desire not to antagonize but only strive to work hand in hand with the United States in the development of China. Japan's special interest in China has been recognized. Japan can not alone ever expect to develop China. If China is developed as we would wish, it must be by the combined effort and capital of the United States and Japan, who are in best position to carry on this work. Japan only desires cooperation with the United States in the bringing forward the wonderful resources of China, a development which will react to the best interest of China and the world at large."

That Japan has made some mistakes in negotiations which have gone on between Japan and China in the past is admitted by Mr. Debuchi, just as it has been admitted by Baron Makino and others of the Japanese peace delegation in Paris. Mr. Debuchi cites the fact that the broadest and most liberal viewpoints of Japanese and world development along democratic lines now are held by the Government in power in Tokyo. In this regard he said:

WILL NOT TRAMPLE IDEALS.

"It is absurd to believe that Japan is an autocratic and militaristic country which will ruthlessly trample down the ideals now set for world civilization. Liberal and progressive movements are gaining in power in Japan—the present cabinet is organized by the first commoner, Mr. Hara, who formerly was a diplomat and chief editor of an influential newspaper in Japan. The liberal policy already followed and that which is about to be placed into effect in regard to China and Korea is well known by everyone who has knowledge of affairs in the Far East.

"In regard to Shantung: Our Government, by treaty with China and by declarations subsequent to its signing in 1915, will return the things we have promised. And remember always—there has been much confusion in the American mind—the real issues center about Kiaochow, and when we speak of the Kiaochow we do not speak of Shantung.

"Kiaochow has an area of but 208 square miles and a population of some 200,000. Shantung Province, which is about the size of the State of Illinois, has 55,984 square miles and a population of 30,000,000.

"Kiaochow, with Tsingtau, during the period of German occupation was fortified by the Germans and public works were erected for permanent tenure. The port, by virtue of fortification, was constantly the subject of annoyance to all nations who wished to use it. It never, in the accepted sense, was a free port. The Germans completely dominated that territory. Civil and legal, as well as jurisdictional, rights were kept strictly in German hands. The rights of the Chinese were ill considered. Chinese ever were trampled upon.

ONLY WANTS AN OUTLET.

"As against this condition here is what Japan intends to do—all that she desires to do in Kiaochow and Shantung:

"Japan wants the railways of Shantung opened, that the products which will be developed by joint international interests may find free outlet through Tsingtau, the capital of Kiaochow. Japan seeks nothing more.

"In the treaty negotiations between China and Japan, which pact was signed at Peking May 25, 1915, the Japanese minister to China, Eki Hioki, in a letter transmitted to Lu Cheng-hsiang, the then minister of foreign affairs of the Republic of China, said:

"'In the name of the Imperial Government I have the honor to make the following declaration to your excellency's Government.

"'If upon the conclusion of the present war the Japanese Government should be given absolutely free disposal of the leased territory of Kiaochow Bay they will return the said leased territory to China, subject to the following conditions:

"'Opening of the whole of Kiaochow as a commercial port.

"'Establishment of a Japanese settlement in the locality to be designated by the Japanese Government.

"'Establishment, if desired by the powers, of an international settlement.

"'Arrangements to be made before the return of said territory is effected between the Japanese and Chinese Governments with respect to the disposal of German public establishments and properties and with other conventions and procedure.'

"As I have stated," continued Mr. Debuchi, "we desire the opening of Kiaochow as a commercial port for reasons which became plainly apparent during the period of German abuse.

QUESTION OF SETTLEMENT.

"In regard to the establishment of a Japanese settlement, we ask nothing that is not granted by China to all other nationals. The word 'settlement' may be misunderstood. In fact, it means nothing more than the setting aside of a certain section for the homes of Japanese nationals, and also for foreign nationals, such, for instance, as is held by the French at Shanghai. In these settlements the rights of Chinese are always respected and in addition China always retains jurisdictional powers. For instance, should arrests for crimes be made within a French, Japanese, or British settlement, the malefactors are turned over to Chinese authorities for punishment under Chinese laws. While asking for such a settlement, which Japan probably would desire to be located in Tsingtau, Japan is ready also that there be an international settlement here or elsewhere, where all nationals might find haven and homes under occidental conditions like in Shanghai."

When asked as to whether or not such settlement could not be the base for Japanese infiltration through the whole Province of Shantung with consequent control of Chinese and their institutions, Mr. Debuchi replied:

"No. This is impossible. First of all because of the preponderant Chinese population. Furthermore, we have no desire to go further than facilitate the commercial outlets through Shantung to the sea."

CONTROL OF RAILROADS.

In reference to Japanese control of the Tsingtau-Tsinan-fu Railroad, Mr. Debuchi declared:

"This line of communication, connecting with the British-German line running from Peking to Nanking, was completely under the domination of Germany during Teuton tenure in Shantung. Under the new order Japan will not seek to retain exclusive privileges and control over this railway, but the Chinese will share proportionately in its direction and management. This line is only important to us in that it affords communication to the interior and a safe outlet for the developed products of China, which we, in cooperation with other nations, hope for in the general process of rehabilitating the Chinese nation.

AMERICANS JOIN WITH JAPANESE.

"In connection with this I would like to point out one feature which seems to have been forgotten. As I stated, the railway line from Peking to Nanking is controlled by British and German capital. Running in close proximity to this railway is the Tientsin-Nanking Grand Canal, costing millions of dollars, which is a joint concern between American and Japanese investors. A great section of this waterway goes through Shantung.

"And now as to the return of Kiaochow and Shantung to the Chinese. I wish to state emphatically that Japan will carry out her pledges at the earliest possible moment. The treaty signed in Paris states specifically:

"'Germany shall hand over to Japan within three months from the coming into force of the present treaty the archives, registers, plans, title deeds, and documents of every kind wherever they may be relating to the administration, whether civil, military, financial, judicial, or other, of the territory of Kiaochow. Within the same period Germany shall give particulars to Japan of all treaties, arrangements, or agreements relating to the rights, title, or privileges referred to in the preceding articles.'

"As you see, until Japan can make sure of the records of Kiaochow and be sure of the eradication of all German influence, until she ascertains positively the true conditions pertaining to property rights in Kiaochow, Japan can not proceed with her negotiations with China in a businesslike way. These negotiations may last another three months, and perhaps one year, but the American people may rest assured that Chinese rights will be restored completely within that period."

This is fairly illustrative of the Japanese viewpoint. This statement reaffirms the declaration of other Japanese statesmen that Japan intends to return the leased territory to China under the terms of the treaty of 1915 and points out the fact that it is impossible for her to return the leased territory immediately, there being a provision in the treaty that certain conditions shall be conformed to; one of them is that Germany shall hand over to Japan all evidences of title and a statement of all property in the territory involved.

ROOT-TAKAHIRA AGREEMENT.

The Root-Takahira "gentlemen's agreement" of November 30, 1908, bound the United States and Japan mutually to respect the Pacific Ocean region possessions of the other and to maintain the principle of equal opportunity for all nations in the commerce of China.

The Lansing-Ishii agreement commits the United States to a recognition of Japan's special interests in China arising from the close proximity of the two countries, and establishes the immunity of China from territorial aggression by any nation.

The significant provision is as follows:

The territorial sovereignty of China nevertheless remains unimpaired, and the Government of the United States has every confidence in the repeated assurances of the Imperial Japanese Government that, while geographical position gives Japan such special interests, they have no desire to discriminate against the trade of other nations or to disregard the commercial rights heretofore granted by China in treaties with other powers.

The Governments of the United States and Japan deny that they have any purpose to infringe in any way the independence or territorial integrity of China, and they declare, furthermore, that they always adhere to the principle of the so-called "open door" or equal opportunity for commerce and industry in China.

Moreover, they mutually declare that they are opposed to the acquisition by any Government of any special rights or privileges that would affect the independence or territorial integrity of China, or that would deny to the subjects or citizens of any country the full enjoyment of equal opportunity in the commerce and industry of China.

Oral assurances that Japan will execute its treaty with China and restore the territory in Kiaochow to China were repeatedly given the peace conference by the Japanese delegates.

Thus by the so-called Lansing-Ishii agreement Japan and the United States are both bound to the obligation to respect and to safeguard the territorial integrity of China.

Japan is thus unalterably committed to the obligation to restore the leased territory to China. No beneficial effect can result if we assume, as some have seemed to do, that Japan is acting in bad faith and that she intends to break her treaty and her promises to restore the territory to China. China can better afford to rely on her treaty rights for a return of the territory than to herself breach that treaty and thus provoke Japan to insist upon her claim acquired from Germany through conquest, for that involves no obligation to restore the territory before the expiration of the lease.

JAPAN'S SPECIAL INTERESTS IN CHINA.

The declaration in the Lansing-Ishii agreement that Japan has special interests in China is supported by well-known circumstances—her proximity to China and the probability that hostile nations like Germany would secure military and naval bases; the fact that Japan's largest external investments are in China; that she is excluded from other hemispheres and has no other field than China for expansion; that her trade and enterprise have greatly increased China's exports and imports; all these facts considered in connection with Japan's small area, a little less than 170,000 square miles, and her enormous population, establish conclusively Japan's right to engage in Chinese commerce. Her national existence is dependent upon certain Chinese products, including coal and iron. These facts illustrate the importance to Japan of the commercial rights which she will enjoy under the treaty with China after the return of the leased territory to China.

SHOULD SUCH DURESS AS ENTERED INTO THE TREATY BETWEEN CHINA AND JAPAN INVALIDATE THE TREATY?

It is said that China is a pacific and Japan a warlike nation and that China was induced by fear of war with Japan to enter into the treaty of 1915 agreeing to whatever arrangements Japan might make with Germany concerning the property and rights in Kiaochow. It is also claimed that it is not only the duty of the United States to refuse to recognize this treaty but that we should treat it as utterly void because made under duress.

This position seems inconsistent and indefensible. Every commercial treaty of importance now in force between China and European nations is the result of war or some other form of duress.

For centuries prior to 1842 China had existed in sublime isolation, keeping closed to other nations every gateway to her commerce. The English through the East India Co. had striven to secure commercial opportunities in China, but these efforts had met in large part with failure.

It was only after a successful war against China that Great Britain compelled a treaty ceding to her the island of Hongkong and opening to British trade five Chinese ports. (Hornbeck Contemporary Politics in the Far East, p. 216.)

In 1854 Great Britain insisted upon access to the whole of the Chinese Empire, and the American and French envoys were instructed by their Governments to cooperate with the British. It became necessary for the French and the British to resort to force, and new treaties were executed in 1858 and 1860. Great Britain, France, and the United States proceeded somewhat upon the theory afterwards set forth in the "open-door policy," but Russia made a separate treaty, obtaining special concessions and privileges in Chinese territory contiguous to Siberia. (Ib., pages 217 and 218.) Through all the years that followed until the outbreak of the Boxer rebellion increasing pressure from the outside was the means by which China was at last compelled to yield other nations the opportunity to carry on commerce with her. It is our just boast that the United States, while supporting a policy of inducing China to yield to the demands of other nations for commercial opportunities with her people, have never sought special rights or privileges and have contended for equal opportunities for all nations in the commerce of China.

This principle underlies the "open-door policy" and the Root-Takahira agreement. The Lansing-Ishii agreement, as already stated, recognizes that Japan has special interest in China, but it expressly reaffirms the right of China to territorial integrity.

In view of the fact that the commercial relations of nearly all nations with China are based on duress in some form, and in contemplation of the further fact that the most important treaties now in force between the various nations are the outcome of wars—which, of course, are the supreme manifestations of duress—why should the claim that China was induced to make the treaty with Japan through fear of war invalidate that treaty, and all other treaties with China, many of which she was compelled by war to execute, be left in force?

If we go back into history and invalidate every treaty into which duress has entered, chaos in international relations will result.

Shall we assert that treaties tainted with duress in which Japan is interested must be invalidated and at the same time recognize English, French, and Russian compacts with the Chinese Government—compacts, for the most part, extorted through wars engaged in for the express purpose of compelling China to yield? Shall we attempt to make one rule for Japan and a totally different rule for other nations?

To ask the question is to answer it.

The treaty of 1915, under which Japan asserts that China is estopped from claiming that German rights in Kiaochow reverted when China declared war on Germany, can not be invalidated through any arbitrary limitations of time we may assert because of alleged duress and other treaties similarly induced be left in force. The United States alone can not create and put into effect an international statute of limitations.

WHAT IS THE EFFECT OF AGREEMENTS DURING THE WAR TO RECOGNIZE THE RIGHTS OF JAPAN TO OBTAIN CESSION FROM GERMANY?

Senators have expressed indignation at the agreement of Great Britain and France during the war to support Japan in her demands at the peace conference for the cession from Germany of rights in Kiaochow. Perhaps the same criticisms apply equally to the action of the United States following these agreements in recognizing the special interests of Japan in China. It is said that they were all made primarily to encourage Japan to increased activities in the war. If it be true that these agreements were entered into as war measures, the obligation to carry out the agreements can not honorably be escaped, even though some Senators may now believe that the agreements should never have been made. If the nations controlling the peace conference, to induce Japan to greater activity in the war agreed to support her in demanding that Germany in the treaty of peace should cede all rights in Kiaochow, that fact becomes of controlling importance and the nations making such agreement must keep faith. They can not break it without classifying themselves as unreliable.

Let me ask the Senators who have characterized this transaction as the most treacherous incident in history to view the subject from the standpoint of the Allies at the time the agreements were made.

China had already made a treaty with Japan as to Kiaochow which is far more beneficial to China than the German treaty relating to rights in Kiaochow, for under the Japanese treaty China is to recover back all territory leased as speedily as arrangements to that end can be effected, while under the treaty with Germany the lease must continue until the end of 99 years from March, 1898.

Japan was prompted to approach France, England, Russia, and the United States because of their interest in maintaining equality of rights for all nations in Chinese commerce and the preservation of Chinese territorial integrity. Each of these nations had an interest in the subject matter, an interest which in general terms is expressed in the "open-door policy" and in the more specific terms of the various treaties and concessions in which some of them had established commercial relations with China. In view of the fact that China had already agreed with Japan concerning the subject, there could be no treachery involved in the agreements by which the allied nations signified in advance their readiness to assent to the arrangement which Japan had made with China.

In passing judgment on the subject now we must not forget the actual conditions which existed when the agreements characterized by some Senators as treacherous were made. The crisis in the war was approaching, if not at hand. The Allies were straining every resource to beat back the ever-advancing forces of the enemy. There were battle lines 500 miles in length. Millions of allied soldiers were lurking in the trenches. Millions were dying in the smoke and the thunder. Millions more were staggering back from the battle fronts wounded and hopeless. Belgium's man power had been exhausted. France was calling to the colors her boys and old men. Great Britain was looking forward to the time when her reserves must be exhausted.

Japan, whose only direct interest in the war was the danger of German aggressions in China, had been offered every inducement by the central empires to cast her lot with them and join in war against the Allies. Germany had tried to make an alliance with Japan that the latter might make war on the United States. Japan realized that she would be doomed by any settlement of the war which left Germany in possession of Kiaochow, because of its proximity to Japan's own territory. As Secretary Lansing said at the time the Lansing-Ishii agreement was made:

> The removal of doubts and suspicions and the mutual declaration of the new doctrine as to the Far East would be enough to make the visit of the Japanese mission to the United States historic and memorable, but it accomplished a further purpose which is of special interest to the world at this time, in expressing Japan's earnest desire to cooperate with this country in waging war against the German Government. The discussions, which cover the military, naval, and economical activities to be employed, with due regard to relative resources and ability, show the same spirit of sincerity and candor which characterize the negotiations resulting in the exchange of notes.

Japan's policy and the course of this Government in recognizing the special interests of Japan in China, while at the same time expressly safeguarding Chinese territory against aggression, were not criticized at the time. They were almost universally approved by the people of the United States as wise and effective. The arrangement marked the doom of the hopes of Germany for a separate peace with Japan and through the latter's influence to secure cooperation from China. It is not just or fair, now that the war has ended and we are enjoying the results of the transaction, to criticize it as an act of treachery.

When the fate of civilization was trembling in the balance, when Germany was using every power she possessed to induce Japan to make a secret treaty with her, a separate treaty of peace, a policy was pursued by Great Britain, France, and the United States which cemented Japan to the cause of the Allies. I believed then and I still think that this policy was just, wise, and necessary. Let Senators who made no protest at the time remain silent now, instead of using their power and prestige in the circulation of propaganda calculated to delay or prevent the ratification of the treaty, and recognize the obligation to treat both China and Japan with fairness. Let them remember that Japan has given her pledge to carry out her treaty with China and restore the ceded territory. If they will but perform this act of simple justice they can not characterize as treacherous the arrangement between the powers by which the Kiaochow territory was taken by Japan in the early stages of the war from Germany and which will be voluntarily returned to China by the Japanese Government.

In the press to-day I have read statements to the effect that the Japanese Government may shortly issue another statement regarding its purpose to return the ceded territory. Whether an additional statement is made or not, Japan is bound by her solemn treaty with China of May 25, 1915, to restore the ceded territory. Senators who take every opportunity to denounce Japan should remember that Japan has never indicated a purpose or desire to breach that treaty. She has always declared it is her purpose to carry it out.

The influences now at work to cause China to hold out in repudiating her treaty with Japan and to create prejudice throughout the United States against Japan do not appear calculated to result in benefit to either China or this country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, before the Senator from Arkansas sits down, I wish to ask that he indicate to the Senate and to the country, if he can, the enormous difference which must exist between our not having found it disgraceful to let Germany take all of these benefits and a little bit more in payment of the mob assassination of a couple of missionaries, while later on we find it perfectly treacherous and dishonorable to let Japan recover from China, after having spent money and sacrificed soldiers' lives, a part of what we tamely permitted Germany to take from China.

Mr. ROBINSON. We not only submitted to it but we actually approved it.

The then Secretary of State, Mr. Hay, actually expressed his gratification at the assurance that the German acquisition of rights, privileges, and territory in Kiaochow would not interfere with American rights in China.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has already called attention to that document.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to ask the Senator from Arkansas whether he remembers or not if the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] was then a member of the Senate and was on the Foreign Relations Committee; whether he remembers or not if the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] was then a Member of the Senate; if he remembers whether the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] was then a Member of the House of Representatives; and if he remembers or not whether either one of these ever raised his voice against the rape of Shantung Peninsula or part of it from China by Germany?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it is true that the Senator from Massachusetts was a Member of the Senate and a member of the Foreign Relations Committee at the time Germany made her treaty with China and acquired rights in Shantung on March 6, 1898. I never heard of his making any protest.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And those rights were equal to those acquired by Japan now, if not greater.

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly. As to whether the Senator from Connecticut had entered the Senate at that time I am not certain. I think, however, he was still a Member of the House of Representatives, as were the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and I; also the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to ask the Senator from Arkansas one more question, and then he can answer all of my questions together. Does the Senator reckon it is possible that the senatorial wolves who are now after the Wilson lamb were rather afraid to raise an issue with Germany which they are now not afraid to raise with the President of the United States? Does the Senator reckon that that could have been possible?

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, no.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I thought not.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, in further answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Mississippi, I want to refer somewhat in detail to a document issued by the State Department, Washington, September 6, 1899, just following the treaty by which Germany had acquired her alleged rights in Kiaochow. The United States Government raised no protest either in China's behalf. Japan's behalf, or in behalf of the open-door policy——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Or of civilization and humanity.

Mr. ROBINSON. Or of civilization and humanity. When Germany took possession of Tsingtau and compelled the execution of the treaty by China which I have mentioned, the Government of the United States, through the then Secretary of State, John Hay, in a document dated Washington, September 6, 1899, said:

> At the time when the Government of the United States was informed by that of Germany that it had leased from His Majesty, the Emperor of China, the port of Kiaochow and the adjacent territory in the Province of Shantung, assurances were given to the ambassador of the United States at Berlin by the Imperial German Minister for Foreign Affairs that the rights and privileges insured by treaties with China to citizens of the United States would not thereby suffer or be in anywise impaired within the area over which Germany had thus obtained control.

The document is quite lengthy. Let me read one more paragraph:

> The liberal policy pursued by His Imperial German Majesty in declaring Kiaochow a free port and in aiding the Chinese Government in the establishment there of a customhouse are so clearly in line with the proposition which this Government is anxious to see recognized that it entertains the strongest hope that Germany will give its acceptance and hearty support.

Mr. WILLIAMS. One more question, and then I shall worry the Senator from Arkansas no longer.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Mississippi is not worrying me; he is instructive and entertaining.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator know whether Woodrow Wilson instructed John Hay to write that note?

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course, every Senator knows who was then President of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask the question for this reason: Some Senators seem to think that Woodrow Wilson has been guilty of everything that has occurred in China in the way of the rape of the Shantung Peninsula, and I wanted the people outside of the Senate to know that he did not instruct John Hay to write that note, unless he did.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I thank Senators for the very courteous attention with which they have followed me during the course of this discussion. I felt, after a somewhat careful investigation of the question, that it was clouded with confusion and misrepresentation. If my remarks have contributed in any degree to relieve the subject from those embarrassing influences I am highly compensated for my effort.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. CURTIS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of California in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Jones, N. Mex.	Nugent	Smith, S. C.
Capper	Kellogg	Page	Smoot
Chamberlain	King	Phelan	Spencer
Cummins	Kirby	Phipps	Sutherland
Curtis	La Follette	Pittman	Swanson
Dial	Lenroot	Pomerene	Thomas
Fletcher	McCumber	Robinson	Walsh, Mass.
Gay	McKellar	Sheppard	Walsh, Mont.
Harrison	Moses	Shields	Warren
Henderson	New	Simmons	Williams
Hitchcock	Newberry	Smith, Ariz.
Johnson, Calif.	Norris	Smith, Ga.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] are necessarily detained on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. RANSDELL responded to his name when called.

Mr. OWEN, Mr. HALE, Mr. FERNALD, Mr. ELKINS, Mr. MCNARY, Mr. FRANCE, and Mr. KNOX entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, it is very unfortunate that there is not a clear understanding throughout the country of what the real issue is in the Senate upon the league of nations. The country ought to know that with very few exceptions the Members of this body, irrespective of party, are in favor of a league of nations, and the country ought to know that with very few exceptions the Republican Members of the Senate are in favor of the league now proposed, provided reservations are made protecting the rights and interests of the United States. The subject matter of these reservations I shall discuss before I conclude.

I sincerely hope that the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom the treaty has been referred, will make a report to the Senate very soon. It is very desirable that the country should know as soon as possible what the issues are in the controversy. I am satisfied that when that report is made the country will see that the issue in the Senate is not whether we shall join a league of nations, and that the only question is to what extent in joining such a league the United States shall surrender its rights and independence of action with relation to refraining from war in the future.

That a league or concert of nations following this World War is desirable seems so clear as not to permit of argument. Anything that we can do to prevent future wars and at the same time preserve our own liberties and independence should be done. With those who argue that the day of isolation and indifference to foreign affairs by the United States is past, I agree. Never again, league or no league, alliance or no alliance, will the United States sit by and watch a world war raging with its President advocating that our people be "neutral in thought as well as in name," nor at such a time will his chief claim for reelection be that "He kept us out of war." We know now that no nation can through war set out to dominate the world without our being directly concerned. We know now that from August, 1914, our own independence and our own liberties were at stake and that it was necessary for us to enter the war with Germany to preserve them.

In this connection I must take occasion to say that President Wilson's statement, in presenting the treaty to the Senate, as to the cause of our entering the war is exactly contrary to the fact. This is his language:

> The United States entered the war upon a different footing from every other nation, except our associates on this side of the sea. We entered it not because our material interests were directly threatened or because any special treaty or obligations to which we were parties had been violated.

As against this statement I quote the words of the President himself immediately preceding and immediately following our entrance into the war.

On February 3, 1917, two months before our war declaration, in his address to Congress, he said:

> We do not desire any hostile conflict with the Imperial German Government. We are the sincere friends of the German people and earnestly desire to remain at peace with the Government which speaks for them. We shall not believe that they are hostile to us unless and until we are obliged to believe it, and we purpose nothing more than the reasonable defense of the undoubted rights of our people.

On April 2 in his war message he said:

> With a profound sense of the solemn and even tragical character of the step I am taking and of the grave responsibilities which it involves, but in unhesitating obedience to what I deem my constitutional duty, I advise that the Congress declare that the recent course of the Imperial German Government to be in fact nothing less than war against the Government and the people of the United States.

One more quotation from President Wilson upon the subject of whether our material interests were directly threatened. On June 14, 1917, a little more than two months after we entered the war, in his Flag Day address, he said:

> It is plain enough how we were forced into the war. The extraordinary insults and aggressions of the Imperial German Government left us no self-respecting choice but to take up arms in defense of our rights as a free people and of our honor as a sovereign Government. The military masters of Germany denied us the right to be neutral. They filled our unsuspecting communities with vicious spies and conspirators and sought to corrupt the opinion of our people in their own behalf.
> When they found they could not do that, their agents diligently spread sedition amongst us and sought to draw our own citizens from their allegiance, and some of these agents were connected with the official embassy of the German Government itself here in our own Capital. They sought by violence to destroy our industries and arrest our commerce. They tried to incite Mexico to take up arms against us and to draw Japan into a hostile alliance with her, and that not by indirection but by direct suggestion from the foreign office in Berlin. They impudently denied us the use of the high seas, and repeatedly executed their threat that they would send to their death any of our people who ventured to approach the coasts of Europe.

And yet in the face of these statements, true statements made by President Wilson when we entered the war, he now says that it was not because our material interests were directly threatened. The fact is exactly the contrary, and it was primarily because they were directly threatened that he asked Congress to declare the existence of a state of war with Germany, and Congress complied.

No man in public life or in private life, except President Wilson, will declare that our war declaration would have been made in April, 1917, if our material interests had not been threatened by Germany. We entered the World War primarily to save the liberties and the independence of the United States of America, threatened by Germany, and any statement to the contrary by whomsoever made is not correct. It is a fact, also, that special treaty obligations had been violated by Germany. Our treaty of 1828 with Germany had been so grossly violated by her that on March 20, 1917, before we entered the war, Secretary Lansing wrote the minister of Switzerland, in charge of German affairs, a note, the concluding paragraph of which is as follows:

> I feel constrained, in view the circumstances, to add that this Government is seriously considering whether or not the treaty of 1828 and the revived articles of the treaties of 1785 and 1799 have not been in effect abrogated by the German Government's flagrant violation of their provisions, for it would be manifestly unjust and inequitable to require one party to an agreement to observe its stipulations and permit the other party to disregard them. It would appear that the mutuality of the undertaking has been destroyed by the German authorities.

Mr. President, I have thus referred to the cause of our entering the war solely because of its bearing upon the obligations which we should assume in the league of nations.

President Wilson lays great stress upon the expectations that had been created in the minds of our associates by our entry into the war. If we had gone in with no special grievance of our own, if, as the President now contends, it was not because our material interests were directly threatened, if we had gone in primarily to help other peoples and not to protect ourselves, then the President's argument that a continuing obligation rests upon us to protect all of the peoples engaged for all time to come with all our resources and all our man power has force, but if on the other hand we went in to protect America primarily, but in so doing rendered a service to all mankind, then we are free to determine for ourselves to what extent we shall obligate ourselves to further protect and assist our associates in the World War.

I assert that all of our associates well knew that we went to war primarily to protect our own interests. They knew that the President of the United States and the Congress had persistently refused to become involved unless it became necessary to protect America. They well knew that President Wilson had secured his reelection in November, 1916—when the European war had been raging for more than two years—upon the slogan "He kept us out of war."

Mr. President, I voted for war because I believed it necessary to save America. I would have had no right to vote for war for any other reason, after the Democratic victory in November, 1916. It is clearer now than it was then that we were right in the action then taken, and we all rejoice with President Wilson that our armies have not only saved America but have been instrumental in bringing liberty to millions of oppressed peoples who for centuries had longed for freedom but had all but abandoned hope of securing it.

The eloquent tribute of President Wilson to the American soldier finds a response in every American heart, but, Mr. President, our boys fought and died for America, for home and native land, to preserve here in America the liberty and independence won for them from Bunker Hill down through the years upon many battle fields, and so, Mr. President, in the consideration of this treaty we have the right, nay, not only the right but it is our duty, to consider America first, for it was for America first that our soldiers went across the sea to fight and to die.

In passing I will call one more witness to prove that we did go to war with Germany because our material interests were directly threatened, a gentleman who has suddenly become a great authority in some quarters. I refer to ex-President Taft. Last December he said "We were forced in to defend our rights on the seas. That is what we went in for."

As I have said, Mr. President, I have referred to this only to show that in considering the interests of America first we are not violating any obligation to our associates in the war, and we are absolutely free to consider first the interests of the United States. But we rejoice in the fact that in preserving our own liberties we have assisted in bringing liberty to other peoples. We should continue to help and to protect them from injustice, but whatever we do in this regard should be understood as voluntarily undertaken upon our part and not because of any obligation to do so, and this distinction is very important in considering the league of nations.

THE 14 POINTS.

I next wish to consider briefly the 14 points, and for the same reason that I have discussed the causes of our entry into the war. If the 14 points have been the guiding stars in this peace treaty, if we have indeed a peace of justice, then we can and should go further in entering a league of nations to preserve that peace than we should if the 14 points have been violated. No one will, I think, contend that we should agree to perpetually protect with the lives of our boys and with our resources a peace any part of which is unjust and wrong, and I shall assume, as President Wilson has done, that the 14 points marked the line of a just peace so plain that all could follow.

I now propose to take up each one of these 14 points and apply them to the treaty which we have before us. But before doing so permit me to say that I am not criticizing President Wilson for not succeeding in securing a treaty in accord in all respects with his 14 points. I think I recognize as fully as anyone the difficult task of President Wilson at Paris. I believe he went there determined to do his utmost to secure a league of nations and the application of his 14 points to the terms of peace. That he failed is not surprising, for the fact is that of all the principal nations around the peace table at Paris there was but one that had no selfish aims, that sought no material advantage for itself, and that nation was the United States.

Indeed, if President Wilson is to be criticized at all it is because while other nations were striving to secure material advantages for themselves President Wilson was striving to place obligations upon the United States for the benefit of other nations. As has been said elsewhere, while other nations were striving to secure assets for themselves President Wilson was striving to secure liabilities for the United States. But in seeking no material advantages for ourselves, he truly represented the people of the Nation. We desire neither territory nor indemnity out of this war. Our only desire is peace and security for ourselves and peace and security for free, liberty-loving peoples all over the world.

Is, then, this peace treaty in accord with the 14 points of President Wilson? In his Christmas address to the soldiers in France he said:

> It happened that it was the privilege of America to present the chart for peace, and now the process of settlement has been rendered comparatively simple by the fact that all the nations concerned have accepted that chart and the application of the principles laid down there will be their application.

If the nations, Mr. President, did accept this chart, that acceptance abrogated all secret treaties—the Japanese-English treaty, the Italian-English treaty, and the provisions of all other treaties in conflict with this chart of peace.

Mr. President, I listened with great interest this afternoon to the defense made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] of the rape of Shantung. He placed practically his whole defense upon the ground that the Allies—England and France—had made a treaty with Japan that Japan should have Shantung, and they could not therefore in honor decline to carry out that treaty. But, Mr. President, if these 14 points mean anything, if they were accepted by all of these other nations, including Japan, as President Wilson says they were accepted, the acceptance of them abrogated the treaty between Japan and England and France. There can be no question about it.

The Senator also pointed to the fact that the United States had recognized the German lease of Shantung and Kiaochow; but I want to call the attention of Senators upon the other side to the fact that although China has been despoiled by others than Japan, as stated by the Senator from Arkansas, up to this good hour the United States never has guaranteed, as it proposes to do in this league of nations, to defend by all the man power in the United States any of those treaties.

The first of the 14 points is: "Open covenants of peace, openly arrived at, after which there shall be no private international understandings of any kind, but diplomacy shall proceed always frankly and in the public view."

That this point has been flagrantly violated in the peace conference and in the provision of the treaty is too plain for argument. Secret diplomacy is nowhere prohibited, and it is not even required that the sessions of the league of nations, in either assembly or executive council, shall be open to the public. The only part of this point that finds any place in the treaty is the requirement that all international engagements thereafter made shall be made public. This is a great gain if adhered to by the nations, but secret diplomacy, intrigue, and plotting in international relations is nowhere forbidden.

The second point reads: "Absolute freedom of navigation upon the seas, outside territorial waters alike in peace and in war, except as the seas may be closed in whole or in part by international action for the enforcement of international covenants."

This point was wholly abandoned at the peace conference. As to its importance I quote President Wilson in his address to the Senate on January 22, 1917:

> And the paths of the sea must alike, in law and in fact, be free. The freedom of the seas is the sine qua non of peace, equality, and cooperation. No doubt a somewhat radical reconsideration of many of the rules of international practice hitherto thought to be established may be necessary in order to make the seas free and common in practically all circumstances for the use of mankind, but the motive for such changes is convincing and compelling. There can be no trust or intimacy between the peoples of the world without them. The free, constant, unthreatened intercourse of nations is an essential part of the process of peace and of development. It need not be difficult either to define or to secure the freedom of the seas if the governments of the world sincerely desire to come to an agreement concerning it.

Thus President Wilson, on January 22, 1917, stated the paramount importance to a durable peace of the freedom of the seas, and yet, on the demand of Great Britain, this point was wholly abandoned at the peace conference. I do not doubt that it was abandoned with the greatest reluctance by President Wilson. I think the fact is that Great Britain absolutely refused to consider it in the peace conference. President Wilson is reported to have said that this point was a joke upon him; that he had not considered that with a league of nations there would be no neutrals to whom the freedom of the seas could apply in time of war. The President must have been misquoted upon this, because the league of nations does clearly contemplate neutrals in time of war, for under its terms if two nations submit a dispute to the executive council, and that council does not come to a unanimous decision, the nations involved are at liberty to go to war three months after the action of the council, and surely the other nations not parties to the dispute will be neutrals to whom the freedom of the seas would apply if it had not been abandoned, if political independence or territorial integrity is not involved.

The third point is: "The removal, as far as possible, of all economic barriers and the establishment of an equality of trade conditions among all the nations consenting to the peace, and associating themselves for its maintenance."

This point is very vague, and the President, as far as I know, has never explained what he had in mind in proposing it. It may be said, however, that article 23 of the league of nations covers this point except as to Germany.

The fourth point is: "Adequate guaranties given and taken that national armaments will be reduced to the lowest possible point consistent with domestic safety."

This point is clearly violated in the peace treaty. The only guaranties required are from enemy countries and nations to be invited to join the league. But as to the nations forming the league there are no guaranties whatever. There is merely a declaration that armaments should be so reduced, and the council shall formulate plans for such disarmament, which each nation is free to accept or reject, as it may choose.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator submit to an interrogation?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield for a question.

Mr. KING. As I understand the Senator, his position is that the league, with respect to the point just discussed, is not sufficiently drastic; that it ought to have compelled the nations signatory to the agreement to have disarmed or to have reduced their armament to a limit therein stated?

Mr. LENROOT. I think there should have been an agreement.

The fifth point reads: "A free, open-minded, and absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims, based upon a strict observance of the principle that in determining all such questions of sovereignty the interests of the populations concerned must have equal weight with the equitable claims of the Government whose title is to be determined."

This point, all must concede, is flagrantly violated in the peace treaty. In the case of Shantung the treaty expressly confirms the title of Japan as a receiver of stolen property; and since listening to the defense of the Senator from Arkansas I find no occasion to change that statement in the slightest degree.

In addition, as the treaty now stands, the United States is to become the owner of an undivided one-fifth of all of Germany's former colonies. Upon my first reading of the treaty I did not realize this, but upon my attention being called to it by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] I have reexamined it, and there can be no doubt that this is the fact. In other words, Germany renounces in favor of the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan all of her right, title, and interest to all her colonies. I shall not upon this occasion discuss this at length. I refer to it now only for the purpose of showing that this point has clearly been violated.

The sixth point demands the evacuation of Russian territory and makes declaration of a Russian policy. If the evacuation demanded refers to enemy troops alone, the peace treaty complies with this point; otherwise not. However, the situation in Russia is and has been so chaotic that it is fair to say that it has not been possible to apply the principles of this point to the treaty.

The seventh point relates to Belgium, and the peace treaty is wholly in accord with this point. The same is true of the eighth point, which refers to French territory and Alsace and Lorraine.

The ninth point reads: "A readjustment of the frontiers of Italy should be effected along clearly recognizable lines of nationality."

The application of this point is still undetermined, for the treaty now before us does not attempt to fix the frontiers of Italy. This will come to us in the treaty with Austria and other treaties, but there is grave danger that when made they will not be in compliance with this point.

The same observations should be made of the tenth point, relating to Austria-Hungary; the eleventh point, relating to the Balkan States; and the twelfth point, relating to the Turkish Empire.

The thirteenth point relates to the independence of Poland, and the treaty before us is, I believe, in the main in compliance with this point.

The fourteenth point reads: "A general association of nations must be formed under specific covenants for the purpose of affording mutual guaranties of political independence and territorial integrity to great and small States alike."

The league of nations is the response to this point, which I shall now discuss.

I have thus, Mr. President, referred to the 14 points and their application to the present treaty. We find that of the 14, 4 have been clearly violated in the treaty, 6 have been complied with, and 4 are not included at all, because they relate to matters not covered by this treaty.

Therefore, at this time, of the 14 points only 6 have been complied with, leaving 8 either violated or undetermined.

Mr. President, I have examined these 14 points in this connection for the same purpose that I discussed the causes of our entry into the war, namely, to ascertain to what extent we were obligated to sacrifice our own liberty of action in a league of nations. If these 14 points had been fully complied with, inasmuch as they were proposed by President Wilson and accepted by all the other nations engaged in the war, I concede that if they had been faithfully carried out we would be under some obligation at least to guarantee a peace made in accord with their principles. But if they have not been carried into the treaty in good faith—and I have shown that they have not—then we are under no obligations to perpetually guarantee the observance of the peace that has been made. Whatever we do in this respect must be regarded as a voluntary act upon our part, and we are entirely free to give first consideration to the interests of the United States.

I wish to state again that, with the exception of the disposition of Shantung, I do not believe that President Wilson should be criticized for the failure to secure the application of his 14 points. Most of our associates in the war were not actuated by the high ideals set forth in the 14 points. They seemed rather to follow—

> The good old plan
> That they shall take who have the power,
> And they shall keep who can.

Nor should we too severely condemn our associates for the course they have pursued. Human nature is still selfish. Great Britain, France, and Italy had suffered terribly by the war, and it was perhaps too much to expect of them that they would willingly make great sacrifices of power or advantage for the sake of an experimental world peace. The distinguished diplomats around the peace table were very practical men; that is, with the exception of those representing the United States.

We have no reason to believe that upon the creation of the league of nations there will be a sudden revolution in the ideals of these associates, and that in itself furnishes one of the strongest reasons why we should be very careful in entering into a partnership with them and should scrutinize very carefully what obligations we shall assume.

I have said nothing concerning whether the terms imposed upon Germany are in accord with the 14 points. It is a hard peace for them, a terrible price for them to pay for their attempt to conquer the world, but evidently the peace conference believed hard terms were necessary to protect the world from future aggression by Germany. Whether the terms imposed are more liable to provoke war in the future than insure peace, I shall not discuss to-day.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

I now come to the consideration of the covenants of the league of nations, and I approach it from the standpoint which I have tried to establish that we should consider them freed from any obligations to other nations, and are at liberty to determine our action with respect to them solely in accord with what we deem to be the best interests of the United States and the welfare of all mankind. Whatever obligations we assume with regard to other peoples we will assume voluntarily and unselfishly, not because there is any preexisting obligation to assume them.

On February 28 last I addressed the Senate upon the league of nations as it was then proposed. I then discussed at length six principal objections to the proposed constitution:

1. Inequality in voting power.
2. The obligations of article 10.
3. The ambiguity as to whether a unanimous vote was required to make an award in a dispute between members of the league.
4. Compulsory mandatories.
5. The jurisdiction of the league over domestic questions.
6. Absence of any right of withdrawal.

The amendments subsequently made at Paris removed the third and fourth objections and greatly lessened the fifth and sixth objections. I shall discuss these as I proceed.

I stated then, and I am convinced now, that we should enter a league of nations to help preserve the peace of the world, and that the plan proposed is a great forward step in this direction.

I shall not take the time to discuss the plan of the organization of the league, for it is familiar to us all and to the country. The inequality in voting power still remains and is objectionable; but since it has been made clear that unanimous action is required in all cases of disputes between nations, and, indeed, in nearly all of the transactions of the council and the assembly, I do not think the inequality in voting power should be an objection to ratification.

I believe the United States can and should be protected by proper reservations, and with such reservations the league may be of great value in preventing future wars and securing a better understanding between nations.

To my mind the greatest value of the league will be in the covenants not to go to war before submitting a dispute over international questions to arbitration or the league, and not until three months after the award of the arbitrators or the recommendation of the executive council or the assembly. With this covenant there can be no war suddenly arising over an honest dispute. The nations will have time to cool off, to deliberate, and there will be opportunity for the friendly offices of other nations.

Of course, if any nation or group of nations determine upon wars of conquest and believe they are strong enough to succeed, this covenant will not deter them. To them the entire league of nations would be regarded as a scrap of paper. But in such case the world would immediately be put upon notice of the menace to its peace, and in such case the United States, irrespective of whether it had joined a league of nations or not, would not sit by for a period of nearly three years, as we did in the present war. Had our people known in the beginning Germany's designs, had our people realized the menace to us—and by our people I mean all of us, including the President and Congress—we would not have waited until April, 1917, as we did.

Any nation member of this league who starts a war in violation of article 12 will be considered an outlaw by all the civilized nations of the earth.

I do not expect, Mr. President, that there will be many unanimous decisions of the council or the assembly settling disputes. This league is not a judicial body, it is a political body, and whenever a dispute is submitted we must expect intrigue and secret diplomacy that will prevent unanimous decisions. It is unfortunate that the covenant does not provide for open sessions of all the meetings of the executive council and the assembly, which would, to some extent at least, tend to prevent secret understandings in the league.

The next most beneficial article in the league, in my judgment, is article 11, which reads as follows:

> Any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the league or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole league, and the league shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations.

This will result in consideration and deliberation by the members of the league of any war or threat of war, wherever it may arise. I do not agree with those who contend that this article deprives any member nation of its freedom of action. Nowhere is the league of nations given power to declare war, nowhere is any force provided to carry out its decisions, nowhere is it given power to command action by any member of the league. Its powers in regard to declaring war are advisory only, and nowhere can be found any mandate to league members to follow the advice. The obligations to engage in war are independent covenants in the document, as are the obligations to refrain from war except after following the procedure prescribed.

While no real power is vested in the league in this article, nevertheless it will have a strong influence in preventing war. I do not believe this would have prevented Germany from starting the present war, but I think it might have prevented the Russian-Japanese War and the Japanese-Chinese War; and now that the old balance of power is destroyed in Europe, which in itself prevented war many times in the last half century, we may confidently hope that a league of nations with article 11 will have a very beneficial influence in this direction.

These two provisions, Mr. President, fully warrant our joining the league, provided our rights and obligations in other respects are fully protected.

With regard to disarmament, while the 14 points have not been complied with and the provisions as drawn will, in my opinion, be worthless in accomplishing any beneficial results, there can be no objection to it, for while it will, in my judgment, do no good it can do no harm. It is, however, unfortunate that this provision of the league has been so misrepresented to the country. Even ex-President Taft has asserted that this disarmament provision is of very great importance, when he, of all men, must know that it is of no value. The only obligation imposed is the recognition that the maintenance of peace requires the reduction of national armaments to the lowest point consistent with national safety and the enforcement by common action of international obligations.

While the council is required to formulate a plan for such disarmament, each Government is at liberty to reject the plan, and, of course, so long as there is one strong power, either within or without the league, that does not accept it, no other nation will do so. It will be observed that the fourth of the 14 points used the words "domestic safety," which have been changed in the covenant to "national safety." There never was a time when militaristic Germany would concede that her armies were greater than was consistent with her "national safety." There never was a time when Great Britain would concede that her navy was greater than was consistent with her "national safety." So the obligation is worthless.

We must look to the future for disarmament, possibly through meetings of the league of nations; but if the nations could not agree upon disarmament now, at the end of this terrible war, with its awful consequences before the eyes of the peace conference, there is very little hope that it will be done in the future. No guaranties have been given and taken, as required by the 14 points, except in the case of Germany, and those guaranties have nothing to do with the league of nations portion of the treaty.

However, as I have already said, while those of us who believe that disarmament is the best guaranty of future peace are deeply disappointed over the violation of the "accepted chart of peace" in this regard, it does not furnish any reason for opposing the league, for presumably President Wilson could not secure its incorporation in the league, and, like the freedom of the seas, it has been abandoned because impossible of accomplishment.

THE AMENDMENTS MADE AT PARIS.

I now come to the amendments to the league proposal made at Paris subsequent to the first draft adopted.

The ambiguity as to whether a majority or unanimous vote was required in disputes submitted to the council or assembly has been removed so as to clearly require a unanimous vote in such cases. As I have already said, this removes one great objection to the original draft and greatly lessens the objection to the inequality in voting power between Great Britain and the United States.

Another very serious objection which has been removed is the compulsory mandatories. As the original draft stood, it is very clear that at least in the case of Turkey every member of the league obligated itself to accept the mandate of the league. If the league selected the United States to become the mandatory of peoples lately belonging to the Turkish Empire, we would agree by the adoption of the league to accept it. I discussed this question at great length in the Senate last February and will not take further time upon it now, for there has been inserted a clause which removes this objection, the clause being that the mandate shall be imposed only upon those "who are willing to accept it."

Inasmuch, therefore, as Congress will be entirely free to reject a mandate proposed, I see no objection to this article as it stands, although I think it would be wise to give notice to the other members of the league, by accompanying resolution, but as no part of the ratification, that Congress alone will exercise this discretion and that the Executive has no power to do so.

JURISDICTION OVER DOMESTIC QUESTIONS.

Serious objection was raised over granting the league jurisdiction over purely domestic questions upon which disputes may arise with other nations.

An amendment has been made, intended, no doubt, to remove this objection, but, in my judgment, it only partially does so. The amendment found in article 15 reads as follows:

If the dispute between the parties is claimed by one of them, and is found by the council to arise out of a matter which by international law is solely within the domestic jurisdiction of that party, the council shall so report and shall make no recommendation as to its settlement.

While this is an improvement over the original draft, it is still open to objection, for as I construe it it grants to the council jurisdiction to determine what are domestic questions. If this council were a judicial body, this to my mind would constitute no great objection; but it is not. The council is a political body. Each member of the council will be seeking advantage for his own Government, except the representative of the United States, and this council will never acquire the judicial attitude of a court. If it should be to the advantage at any time of the other Governments members of the council to take jurisdiction of a domestic question in the United States, it is not at all improbable that they would do so. But those who urge the ratification of the treaty without reservations contend that no jurisdiction is given the league over domestic questions. Then why not by reservation say so in plain language, so that it will be clear that the decision of the council shall not be binding upon a nation claiming that the dispute is wholly one within the domestic jurisdiction of that nation?

RIGHT OF WITHDRAWAL.

There are many of us, Mr. President, who felt that we could vote for no league of nations whose constitution did not provide for the right of withdrawal. We felt that to enter into obligations perpetual in their nature, obligations that might result in the destruction of our Republic, would be an act of despotism inconsistent with the right of any free people. For one man, the Executive, and 96 Senators to fix obligations for unborn generations to the end of the world without opportunity to ever be relieved of them would be the greatest crime in history, a crime greater than the autocracy of the Kaiser, whom we have defeated. Autocracy can be destroyed by revolution, and it is the right of a people to change their government as they see fit. We in the United States have provided an orderly, peaceable way of doing so; but the right of revolution, either by the ballot or with the sword, carries no right to violate solemn obligations duly made with other nations, and the original constitution of the league carried a perpetual obligation. The provision for amendment offered no protection, for other nations could prevent amendment.

I am aware, Mr. President, that some Senators sought to defend this un-American and undemocratic obligation, which leads me to remark that partisanship is being charged against Republicans in the consideration of this treaty, a charge which I know—at least as to the overwhelming majority of Republican Senators—is utterly without foundation. But I do say, Mr. President, that if Senators across the aisle would only forget that President Wilson is the leader of the Democratic Party, and remember that this is an American question so crucial, so important to our country, so fateful to its future that consideration of political advantage should not have the weight of a feather in our deliberations—if this could be done, Mr. President, I am confident that we could come to an almost unanimous agreement as to reservations for the protection of the United States.

When I digressed I had stated that some Senators prior to the amendments made at Paris sought to defend the perpetual obligation imposed. Those Senators will in due time answer to their constituents for the position then taken. But, fortunately, that is no longer an issue, for the amendments made provide for withdrawal upon two years' notice, provided that all of the international obligations of the withdrawing member have been fulfilled at the time of withdrawal.

This, in my judgment, sufficiently protects the right of withdrawal, provided the interpretation is given that the withdrawing member shall itself determine whether its obligations have been fulfilled to give it that right. It is contended by some that the council will determine that fact, and that, therefore, no right of withdrawal exists without the permission of the council. It is my opinion that no such jurisdiction is vested in the council or the league. If a dispute arises between the league and a member on this question, each stands upon an equal footing. It is exactly as if two parties to a contract disagreed as to its terms and there was no judicial or other determining body created by law to settle the dispute. Each party could put his own construction upon it. One could refuse to perform, and the other could only compel him to perform if he was the stronger of the two. The only determining factor in such a case would be "might makes right." But the league of nations is given no authority to enforce its decisions, and inasmuch as we have made no agreement to be bound by its decision upon the question of withdrawal we would be free to act. Remember, this would be a dispute between ourselves and the league, not between us and individual members of the league, and it is clear to me that to bind us there would have to be a clear grant of power to the council or the league to decide the dispute, and no such grant is found in the covenant.

The distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] takes this position, but there are other Senators upon both sides of the aisle who do not agree to this construction. In these circumstances there should not be the slightest objection to a reservation giving our construction of this provision, and, of course, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] will be glad to support such a reservation, which is wholly in accord with his own views.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

Very similar observations can be made with regard to the Monroe doctrine. It is insisted by all of the supporters of the covenant in the form now proposed, without reservations, that the Monroe doctrine is fully protected, while other equally eminent statesmen and lawyers express grave doubt upon the subject.

No one attempts to defend the phraseology purporting to safeguard the Monroe doctrine. Its defenders admit the provision is awkwardly expressed. It reads: "Nothing in this covenant shall be deemed to affect the validity of international engagements, such as treaties of arbitration or regional understandings like the Monroe doctrine, for securing the maintenance of peace." Even Henry W. Taft, brother of the ex-

President, in the volume entitled "The Covenanter," says "it need not be denied that this descriptive phrase was not the best that could have been selected," and he proposed a reservation upon it which I quote:

> But if the Senate is of the opinion that the use of the words "regional understandings" creates any doubt as to the meaning of article 21, it can in ratifying the treaty make a declaration that its action is taken under the reservation that the covenant is to be so construed as to leave the Monroe doctrine unaffected. In view of the general purposes and effect of the league referred to above, such a reservation would not be regarded as a substantial amendment of the covenant.

Mr. President, aside from the indorsement thus given to a reservation upon the Monroe doctrine, I commend this opinion to those Senators who contend that any reservations made will jeopardize the entire treaty. But I have no doubt that at the proper time the Senate will readily agree to a reservation upon the Monroe doctrine.

There is another reservation that I think there would be no difficulty in agreeing upon, and that is in relation to disarmament should any nation adopt the recommendation of the council in that regard. It will be remembered that when the plan formulated is once adopted, armament can not thereafter be increased without the consent of the council.

Gen. William Crozier, whose article upon the league of nations I placed in the RECORD a few days ago, called attention that this should apply only to peace armaments, and this is very obvious. When we consider that the league assents to war under certain conditions, it is plain that nations actually engaged in war with such assent should not have the limitation applied to them while so engaged; otherwise a nation having a stronger military or naval force than its opponent would have it at its mercy.

ARTICLE 10.

This brings me to a discussion of article 10, around which centers the principal contest over the ratification of the covenant in its present form. By its terms the United States would guarantee the existing political independence and territorial integrity of every other member of the league against external aggression.

Mr. President, I had supposed that there was at least one policy settled by the American people for all time, and that is that the United States would never engage in an unjust war; that the United States would never fight upon the side of an oppressor; that it would never fight upon the side of autocracy against liberty; that the blood of our boys would never be poured out to preserve despotism anywhere upon the face of the earth. Until a short time ago anyone who would have proposed otherwise would have been looked upon as a traitor to the ideals upon which this Republic was founded.

Mr. President, it would be bad enough to obligate future generations to fight for any cause, but it would be monstrous to obligate them to fight for an unjust cause, and that is exactly what article 10 in its present form does. Under this article, if any member of the league should undertake to do for an oppressed people what France did for us in the Revolutionary War, what we did for Cuba in the Spanish War, we would be compelled to fight that nation.

President Wilson has declared time and time again that the application of his 14 points was absolutely necessary to insure a just and durable peace. I have demonstrated how those principles have been violated in the treaty before us. If President Wilson was right upon his 14 points, then he is wrong now in demanding that we underwrite to the extent of all our man power and all our resources a peace not in accord with those 14 points.

Let me give two concrete examples of our obligations under this article:

In case China should engage in war for the recovery of Shantung, of which she has been robbed, we engage to fight upon the side of Japan to help her retain her stolen property.

In the case of the Saar Basin it is provided that at the end of 15 years a plebiscite shall be taken upon three questions—1, maintenance of the régime established by the treaty; 2, union with France; and 3, union with Germany. But even though the vote is in favor of Germany at the end of these 15 years, the league is empowered by a majority vote to turn the inhabitants over to the sovereignty of France. What a mockery of the right of self-determination! Assuming that, notwithstanding the wishes of the people affected, the league turns them over to France and the people rebel, if Germany should ever assist them under article 10 we would be compelled to fight, not to resist unprovoked aggression by Germany upon territory that she is in right and equity entitled to, but on the part of France to enable her to retain under her sovereignty an unwilling people.

Mr. President, it was with special reference to article 10 that I examined at so much length the application of the President's 14 points to this peace treaty, and particularly in view of the treaty's violation of them. I assert that neither President Wilson nor the Senate of the United States has any moral right to obligate the United States to go to war to preserve the territorial integrity and existing political independence of members of the league.

If article 10 be assented to in its present form, then future generations will not be permitted to consider the justice of declaring war to fulfill this obligation. If they are called upon to declare war to preserve an existing injustice, to protect despotism, they must choose between fighting in an unjust cause or regarding a solemn treaty as a scrap of paper.

We should all agree that never shall we be placed in Germany's class regarding the obligation of treaties. Therefore, with this article in its present form, whenever the occasion may arise the people of the United States will not be permitted to determine the justice of a war in which they may be called upon to engage, but they are told by this article—

> Theirs not to make reply,
> Theirs not to reason why,
> Theirs but to do and die.

I have spoken thus far of our engagements to preserve the territorial integrity of boundaries as fixed in this treaty. In addition, there are other boundaries of which we know nothing as yet that are also guaranteed by article 10.

Peace treaties between Austria-Hungary, Turkey, and Bulgaria have not yet been completed. What form they will take we do not know, but we have sufficient information to have just grounds for fearing that these boundaries will not be in accord with the 14 points. We know something of the bitterness existing between Italy and the Jugo-Slavs. Our mail is daily filled with propaganda by both sides. If we should ratify this treaty now with no reservation as to article 10 we would guarantee territorial boundaries which are not now in existence and concerning which peoples are to-day actually engaged in war.

Can it be possible, Mr. President, that there is a Democrat so partisan that he does not see the necessity of a reservation as to article 10 relieving us of the obligation of declaring war in an unjust cause? I am profoundly convinced that if partisanship be forgotten and only Americanism remembered we can agree upon a reservation to this article, now so dangerous to the cause of true liberty, so destructive of American ideals and principles. I care not in what form the reservation is made so long as it does not obligate us to engage in war irrespective of the justice of the cause. It may take the form of a reservation that inasmuch as Congress alone under the Constitution has the power to declare war the ratification is made with the reservation that nothing in the treaty shall obligate the Congress to declare war against its will. It may take the form of undertaking for ourselves only to respect the territorial integrity and existing political independence of members of the league, without requiring us to compel others to do so. Other forms of reservations would be acceptable so long as they accomplish the one object of leaving to the people of the United States freedom of action to refrain from engaging in war against their will.

This does not mean that the United States will not concern itself in external aggressions against any people. It does not mean that we will not in any particular case agree to make war against an offending member; it means only that when that time may come the boys and the fathers and mothers of the boys who would do the fighting shall have a voice, through the Representatives they have chosen, in the determination of that question.

With the reservations I have referred to I believe the league of nations should be agreed to, for I believe that then there will be no surrender of those liberties for which the fathers fought and died and for whose preservation thousands of American boys lie sleeping under the sod of France.

I believe America is the hope of the world. Let us not destroy that hope by making any engagements not in keeping with eternal principles of liberty and justice, but rather let us cooperate in a league of nations for their promotion, reserving to ourselves the right to determine the justice of a cause for which we are asked to fight.

Let us declare that this great people stand ready to fight in any war which may again menace the peace of the world, but that we will fight only upon the side of liberty and justice, and will enter into no obligations to do otherwise.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may, I desire to ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question before he takes his seat. A few moments ago, while discussing the subject of the German colonies, the Senator referred to that paragraph in the treaty which reads as follows:

> Germany renounces in favor of the principal allied and associated powers all her rights and titles over her overseas possessions.

Thereafter he made the statement, if I understood him correctly, that that gave to us an undivided one-fifth interest in those German colonies.

Mr. LENROOT. I did.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator did not understand, I assume, that it gave to us an undivided one-fifth sovereignty over these colonies in perpetuity?

Mr. LENROOT. I do, so far as the cession from Germany is concerned. The only limitation upon it is the mandatories of the league of nations.

Mr. POMERENE. That is just what I expected to refer the Senator to. That article, being article 22 of the covenant, reads, in part, as follows:

> To those colonies and territories which as a consequence of the late war have ceased to be under the sovereignty of the States which formerly governed them, and which are inhabited by peoples not yet able to stand by themselves under the strenuous conditions of the modern world, there should be applied the principle that the well-being and development of such peoples form a sacred trust of civilization and that securities for the performance of this trust should be embodied in this covenant.

Then it continues:

> The best method of giving practical effect to this principle is that the tutelage of such peoples should be intrusted to advanced nations who by reason of their resources, their experience, or their geographical position can best undertake this responsibility, and who are willing to accept it, and that this tutelage should be exercised by them as mandatories on behalf of the league.

I desire to call the Senator's attention to the further language to the effect that these colonies are believed to be divisible into certain classes, and reference is made to the colonies of Turkey. I will read the first sentence referring to the Turkish Empire:

> Certain communities formerly belonging to the Turkish Empire have reached a stage of development where their existence as independent nations can be provisionally recognized subject to the rendering of administrative advice and assistance by a mandatory until such time as they are able to stand alone. The wishes of these communities must be a principal consideration in the selection of the mandatory.

I refer to these provisions as indicating what is clearly the intention of the powers—that these colonies shall be given their independence so soon as they may be regarded as capable of exercising it. I do not believe that any other construction can be fairly placed upon that language.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator deny that the cession of Germany does grant all of the title of her colonies to the five powers?

Mr. POMERENE. There is no doubt about that at all.

Mr. LENROOT. So far as the mandatory is concerned, it is merely the managing agent. The "Big Five" control the league. So far as these declarations are concerned, as the Senator well knows, it is exactly the policy that Great Britain has set forth to the world as her reason and her excuse for enlarging her empire from time to time.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, no; with all due respect, these provisions of the treaty must be construed as a whole; and it seems to me that, if one bears in mind the trust powers which are conferred upon the mandatory through the league, the ultimate result will be that as quickly as these nations arrive at a point where they can govern themselves they will be given that right.

Mr. LENROOT. There is not a word or syllable in the treaty from beginning to end that will be binding on any of the five powers to do that thing any more than there is in the treaty with reference to compelling Japan to release the sovereignty of Shantung to China.

The Senator argues that this is a trust to the five principal allied powers. I will ask the Senator why the distinction was made in the case of the Saar Basin, where there was a cession, not to the five powers but to the league of nations in trust? Why, if the Senator is correct, was there not a cession to the league of nations in trust for the colonies of which he speaks?

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I beg pardon. It is very evident that the powers, including the United States, look upon the entire league of nations as an experiment, and we must all consider the possibility of the league of nations going the way that other leagues have gone in the past. When it does, the United States will have an undivided one-fifth sovereign interest in every one of these German colonies to do with them as it will.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I, of course, do not know what the reasons were which prompted the peace commissioners to make the distinction, though I think I can understand. The Saar Basin was a part of the German Empire and a part of Germany's territory. The interest which the Allies took in that basin was for a period of 15 years. It was a leasehold, in other words, with certain possible rights to mature or to be perfected thereafter. That was one thing; but it was certainly clearly the intention of the peace commissioners entirely and forever to separate the German colonies from Germany. So in dealing with the subject they saw fit first to take the entire title to those properties over to themselves and then, under the covenant of the league of nations, they provide the method for their tutelage. There is certainly a very clear distinction between the two.

PEACE TREATY AND THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, with reference to the observations of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], I desire to say that it seems to me perfectly clear that the five powers do not take each an undivided one-fifth interest in all the territories or colonies in the way and in the respect that the Senator from Wisconsin seems to have in mind. That provision of the treaty found on page 63 of Senate document No. 49, being article 199, that "Germany renounces in favor of the principal allied and associated powers all her rights and titles over her overseas possessions," is simply a kind of a transfer or assignment or quitclaim of all her right, title, and interest in all her overseas possessions. It is followed by article 257, which is found on page 114 of this document, in which it is provided that—

> In the case of the former German territories, including colonies, protectorates, or dependencies, administered by a mandatory under article 22 of Part I (league of nations) of the present treaty, neither the territory nor the mandatory power shall be charged with any portion of the debt of the German Empire or States.
> All property and possessions belonging to the German Empire or to the German States situated in such territories shall be transferred with the territories to the mandatory power in its capacity as such, and no payment shall be made nor any credit given to those Governments in consideration of this transfer.

That relates back to article 119 and to the transfer to which the Senator referred, and shows the relation also between the treaty and the league of nations; the one fits in with the other, because this very article 257 refers specifically to article 22 of the league of nations, to which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] has alluded. The three articles are in that way tied together so as to make it perfectly clear that, whereas Germany relinquishes all her right, title, and interest in these colonies to the powers mentioned, they are to be held in trust for the benefit of the colonies themselves; and the mandatories selected and agreed upon and accepting that trust shall be vested immediately with the control of the properties so far as may be necessary in order to effect the tutelage, development, progress, and growth of those colonies.

That is the purpose of the whole plan. The purpose is not that the United States shall have any undivided interest in these colonies as such. The United States, merely as a party to this agreement, proposes to recognize the principle of a trust relation between the mandatory and the colonies themselves as created by the covenant, the idea being that a relation somewhat like that of guardian and ward will be established between the mandatory and the colony in each instance.

The Senator from Wisconsin alluded to another feature which he said was something of a disappointment to him, regarding this treaty, and that was that it did not absolutely do away with secret diplomacy. Of course, there is no way to prevent secret communications, secret conferences, and secret transactions between diplomats or representatives of governments. The only thing that can be done is to prevent secret contracts in the shape of treaties, and that is accomplished by the provisions of article 18 of the league of nations covenant, which requires that—

> Every treaty or international engagement entered into hereafter by any member of the league shall be forthwith registered with the secretariat and as soon as possible be published by it. No such treaty or international engagement shall be binding until so registered.

Other points discussed by the Senator from Wisconsin I will attempt to deal with as I reach them.

Mr. President, speaking generally with reference to the treaty and the league of nations, so much has been spoken and written on this subject that I must doubt if I shall be able to offer a new thought. It is a case of "Say what you will, you may find it all in Plato."

It is a matter of such momentous and vast importance to the country and, indeed, to the world, however, that I feel under a burden of duty to indicate the views with which I am impressed and which will control my action respecting the treaty.

The duty of passing judgment on this treaty involves the duty of studying it and reaching conclusions about it, and the responsibility of recording that conclusion would seem to involve the obligation to express the reasons therefor.

The treaty is now before us. It must be ratified or rejected in whole or in part. Accepting it upon conditions or with certain reservations is the same thing as refusal to ratify it as presented. Such a course proposes changes and modifications, which must be submitted to the other parties to the treaty. If they agree to such changes or modifications, the treaty will take that amended form. If they disagree, the treaty fails. The President has the sole authority and responsibility under the Constitution to negotiate the treaty. As completed in the process of that negotiation he must then lay it before the Senate for its "advice and consent."

The Senate, of course, may differ with the President and refuse its consent and may advise that certain changes be made or certain reservations or conditions may be required or imposed.

In that case the President may drop the matter or he may present the Senate's action to the reassembled conference for its acceptance or rejection.

If the latter happens, there is no treaty, so far as we are concerned.

There must be a meeting of the minds of all the parties on all the provisions as they appear, as in the case of every contract; otherwise there is no contract.

Mr. Justice Brown said, in One hundred and eighty-third United States, pages 176 to 183:

Obviously the treaty must contain the whole contract between the parties, and the power of the Senate is limited to a ratification of such terms as have already been agreed upon between the President, acting for the United States, and the commissioners of the other contracting power. The Senate has no right to ratify the treaty and introduce new terms into it which shall be obligatory upon the other power, although it may refuse its ratification or make such ratification conditional upon the adoption of amendments to the treaty.

It is most deplorable that at the end of the four years' war, the most terrible and gigantic in history, in which the cause of democracy and freedom was victorious, and after some five months of discussion of the terms the winning nations should impose on the defeated foes, and the final settlement of those terms, which has been with infinite labor, patience, and care reached, we are now confronted with differences here which go to the very root of that settlement.

It is most unfortunate that we can not unite, as did those around the peace table, and give our unanimous indorsement to what they did. Doubtless each one of them would have written something different if their views and wishes, respectively, had been singly and alone consulted. They gave and took for the general good; put to one side selfish demands; yielded individual preferences to the common cause; adopted a broad view of conditions; and in a generous, patriotic spirit endeavored to safeguard the future while taking care of the present.

When we entered the war our undertaking was to resist and overcome the deadly assaults made on the democracy of the world and to secure both a righteous and a permanent peace. With this pledge in mind, after victory was attained, the President, who had outlined the issues and set forth the general principles of settlement, which were accepted by our associates, personally took part in the negotiations and assisted in framing the treaty which was finally agreed upon and which he has laid before this body for its appropriate action.

The principal objection urged is with respect to the provision for a league of nations.

By this provision it was intended "to promote international cooperation and to achieve international peace and security by the acceptance of obligations not to resort to war; by the prescription of open, just, and honorable relations between nations; by the firm establishment of the understandings of international law as the actual rule of conduct among governments; and by the maintenance of justice and a scrupulous respect for all treaty obligations in the dealings of organized peoples with one another."

Such a purpose surely commends itself to the intelligence and conscience of mankind everywhere.

If there be any provision in conflict with the high objects declared, we may well examine it and criticize it, and even endeavor to correct it.

There is no provision inconsistent with the intentions set forth. They are not only in harmony with those aims but they are essential to their effectual accomplishment.

It is difficult to suggest any improvement of thought or language to that end.

There has been no successful effort of that sort.

It is even more difficult to point out a way of effecting the purposes mentioned by any less emphatic or less binding covenants.

It would seem unnecessary to add to or take from the terms of the covenant.

OBJECTIONS TO ANY LEAGUE WHATEVER.

Some of those who raise objections to the league of nations covenants do so on the ground that we should refrain from any alliance whatever with other nations respecting peace or war; that the United States should not enter into any international agreement or form any league or associate themselves with any nations in the form of covenants imposing any obligations or limiting in any degree perfect freedom of action in any and all circumstances.

They not only oppose the league of nations plan now before us but they are opposed to any kind of a plan.

It is not worth while to discuss the details of the plan submitted, so far as they are concerned.

It could not be made satisfactory to them. No amendment, no reservation, no separate construction, no condition, could be framed that would cause it to meet with their favor.

They argue that any covenant with other nations, any alliance, would mean a certain relinquishment of our sovereignty, a sacrifice in some degree of our independence, and they are unwilling to allow either.

I am utterly unable to see any such danger or to find any grounds for such objections in the terms of the covenants submitted. There would be, of course, some right of free and independent action surrendered just as there is under any contract any individual may make. The consideration received is a fair exchange in the one case as in the other. The covenants of all the other nations, the relinquishments and yielding of arbitrary, unrestrained action on their part is an important consideration. The concessions, which are mutual, in favor of a council and an assembly, in which we all take part, for certain definite and fixed objects, is shared by all for the good of all. The return of what is given up balances the giving. The consideration is the securing of the peace of the world. The prevention of such bloody performance as we have experienced the past four years surely is of some value. If we have a conscientious and certainly to some extent an efficacious scheme to prevent war, avoid anarchy, and make impossible chaos, surely it would be advisable to invest a modicum of sovereignty and independence in it.

If by surrendering something ourselves, valuable though it be, we can help establish a reign of international law and international morality, we may well make the contribution. We save and reserve and hold all the sovereignty and all the independence we can use or can ever need when we part with enough to furnish our share of what may lead mankind away from force and oppression to the high plane of peace and law and justice. We have done this thing we are now warned against, given up something of sovereignty and something of independence, in every treaty we have made, and we have been wisely and without regret making them for over a hundred years.

ISOLATION IDEA.

The argument that we ought to attend to our own affairs and withdraw all concern about the affairs of others is not persuasive. Robbed of its obvious selfish character it is founded on the wrong hypothesis. It is founded on the notion of an isolated America. It presupposes that this country stands quo ad the world just where it was a hundred years ago. It takes no cognizance of the progress made in the sciences and arts. It ignores the increase in population here and elsewhere and the development and expansion which has brought all the peoples of the earth into elbow touch. It takes not into account the means of communication, the facilities for transportation, which serve the interest as well as the wants of people in the most remote regions, and which emphasize the dependence of each and the interdependence of all.

When the much-quoted advice about avoiding entangling alliances was given in September, 1796, conditions at home and abroad were altogether different from what they are now. Indeed, human foresight could not have pictured the changes which have taken place. The imagination could not have grasped them. Patrick Henry rode up to the home of his friend George Washington at Mount Vernon one evening on his way to the First Continental Congress. They spent the evening no doubt discussing the work ahead of them. Next morning they, the first Virginia Delegates, proceeded by the shortest route and the fastest means—on horseback—to Philadelphia. They arrived at the end of the third day. In as many hours by three different ways that journey can be made to-day—by railroad train, automobile, and aeroplane. Those gentlemen would not have believed such a thing possible.

In the time it required Andrew Jackson to journey from the Hermitage to Washington to take the oath of office you can encircle the globe. There is not a spot on earth a battle could be fought after peace was declared without knowing the war was over, as was done at New Orleans.

In those days the Atlantic was crossed in wooden vessels of a few hundred tons, requiring a month for the trip. The minds of men could not conceive the possibility of liners of 50,000 tons, requiring six days, and carrying 10,000 people.

Communication by small boats and by couriers overland in those days was quite a different thing from the telegraph, telephones, railroads, and steamships of to-day, which make the oceans but small lakes and the very air a whispering gallery.

Wireless messages flashing 8,000 miles annihilate time and space.

When the Secretary of the Navy can sit at his desk and talk to an aviator flying 90 miles an hour, 150 miles away, it ought to convince us that America has not stood still during the passing, pulsing years.

The same is true of other countries in varying degrees.

A proposition to ransom American captives in Algiers and pay tribute to the Berber Government, such as Washington urged in 1792, would scarcely meet with favor to-day. When one talks about departure from the policy of Washington, as announced in September, 1796, it may be in order to say the President would not to-day negotiate a treaty and the Senate advise and consent to its binding the United States to pay a "Barbary pirate $40,000 to ransom 35 captives, and $25,000 bonus, and $25,000 annually for exemption from depredations." We would deal with that situation in quite a different way.

It may be conceded that some peoples have made little progress, but generally it would be found in their cases the laws of evolution have not had full play. By reason of oppression, lack of freedom, constant wars, no incentive or encouragement to progress, no opportunities such as obtain where every man is set free to be his best and do his best, they have been held back. They ought to be given a chance. If we can be of service in that direction, can we justify a selfish determination to turn a deaf ear to their call?

It must be considered, too, that, whether we like it or not, we are to some extent involved in their fate. The earth has been compressed. We are next door to people we only knew in a historical way in our early days. We trade with them. We are producing things they want, and they are producing things we want, and we have the means of conveying those things back and forth. Their social life and customs, particularly their health, concern us. An epidemic of some fatal disease may spread to our borders from foreign lands. Our people travel and invest everywhere. Other people do the same. A financial disturbance in almost any country has its reaction or consequences of some kind here. An earthquake or volcanic eruption occurring anywhere on the earth is known within a few hours, and relief measures are at once instituted where they can avail.

The war just ended demonstrates conclusively we can not escape any similar outbreak and calamity begun anywhere. Experience ought to have taught us that we are no longer isolated, and the possibilities of isolation grow less and less as time passes. The movement is the other way, as certain and as irresistible as the tides.

As the heaped waves of the Atlantic follow the moon, the currents of world activities and world experiences follow the laws of progress. Man is not lost or condemned; he is imperfect, and his destiny is toward perfection. The same is true of peoples and nations. Society is not a piece of mechanism, like a house, which may be destroyed totally. Human society is an organism composed of living cells capable of unlimited growth. So with nations. If the large and powerful may cooperate, they can be of immense advantage without material burden to themselves, and that cooperation may extend to the small and weak, so they may live their own lives and develop without interruption. No civilized nation can be indifferent or "careless of mankind." Certain responsibilities to civilization, to mankind, rest on all enlightened people and their government. One of these is to, if possible, prevent the slaughter of human beings and the wanton destruction of treasure to gratify the greed and ambition of some unscrupulous oppressor.

Individuals, through passion or a kind of insanity, harm the innocent and outrage society. Nations lose their self-control. Some superior authority must restrain the one, and there ought to be some power to protect against the ravages of the other. The good of society requires the one and the good and happiness of the world calls for the other. The heavy burden of duty rests upon all men in position to aid in bringing about that condition of order and stability.

OTHER OBJECTIONS.

Before the league of nations was formulated there were those who were sneering at it, criticizing the idea, and raising objections to it. After the first draft was prepared they were loud in their denunciation. One can not escape the impression that many of these were prompted by personal animosity toward the President and others by partisan bitterness, and both these groups by a desire to paralyze his leadership at whatever cost, and that at a time of a commanding world crisis. They were plainly actuated by the ignoble motive to handicap and hinder, and they offered no assistance or constructive suggestions.

Others doubted because they lacked vision; withheld approval because they did not grasp the subject. Others, since they could not lead themselves, were disposed to criticize all efforts and thwart all accomplishment.

They demanded they should be consulted, even though the Constitution vested the authority to conduct negotiations exclusively in the Executive.

They continued their attacks while the negotiations were in progress, when they knew the only effect would be to embarrass those having the matter in hand.

They discussed "leaks" which amounted to nothing, but which they endeavored vainly to magnify into a public scandal. They offered resolutions and had them cabled to the peace conference—and then let them rest.

Finally the time came to specify, and the burden of complaint was directed to article 10. That article is short and reads as follows:

> The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression, or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression, the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

This article clearly and expressly refers to external aggression. Only in case of such aggression—that is, an attack by one State on another, an invasion from the outside by one nation of another, or the threat or danger of such attack or invasion—will the league have any jurisdiction.

Then the action must be unanimous, excluding the parties in interest. The action is limited to advising "upon the means by which this obligation is to be fulfilled."

Under article 12 the members of the league agree to submit any dispute which may arise between them either to arbitration or to inquiry by the council, composed of nine members, and they further agree not to resort to war until three months after the award by the arbitrators or the report of the council. The award of the arbitrators, if the matter is submitted to them, must be made within a reasonable time, and the report of the council must be made within six months after submission, if the dispute goes to them.

Upon 14 days' notice either party may have the controversy go to the assembly. The action there must be by unanimous vote of all members of the council and a majority of the assembly.

Under article 13 the members agree to submit matters recognized as suitable, and which can not be settled by diplomacy, to arbitration. For instance:

> Disputes as to the interpretation of a treaty, as to any question of international law, as to the existence of any fact which if established would constitute a breach of any international obligation, or as to the extent and nature of the reparation to be made for any such breach are declared to be among those which are generally suitable for submission to arbitration.
> For the consideration of any such dispute the court of arbitration to which the case is referred shall be the court agreed on by the parties to the dispute or stipulated in any convention existing between them.
> The members of the league agree that they will carry out in full good faith any award that may be rendered, and that they will not resort to war against a member of the league which complies therewith. In the event of any failure to carry out such an award, the council shall propose what steps should be taken to give effect thereto.

Article 14 authorizes the council to formulate and submit to the members of the league plans for the establishment of a permanent court of international justice.

Article 15 provides that disputes not submitted to arbitration the members agree to submit to the council, and the council will endeavor to effect a settlement.

> If the dispute between the parties is claimed by one of them, and is found by the council to arise out of a matter which by international law is solely within the domestic jurisdiction of that party, the council shall so report, and shall make no recommendation as to its settlement.
> The council may in any case under this article refer the dispute to the assembly. The dispute shall be so referred at the request of either party to the dispute, provided that such request be made within 14 days after the submission of the dispute to the council.

Article 16 provides for the steps to be taken in case of disregard of covenants under articles 12, 13, or 15 toward the offending nation. It is to be subjected to the "severance of all trade or financial relations, the prohibition of all intercourse between their nationals and the nations of the covenant-breaking State, and the prevention of all financial, commercial, or personal intercourse."

The council must recommend to the several Governments concerned what effective military, naval, or air force the members of the league shall severally contribute to the armed forces to to be used to protect the covenants of the league.

The members covenant to mutually support one another in the financial and economic measures which are taken.

These are the vital, working articles of the league. The plan would be ineffectual without either of them. It would amount to a mere expression of purpose and a sort of interchange of sympathy and good will. These articles make the plan workable, practical, and efficacious. They are necessary just as the league is a necessary part of the treaty if we are to have reasonable assurances of peace lasting overnight. Without them, the league is a hollow shell, a pretense, and a sham.

In almost every case resort to economic pressure as provided in section 16 will afford ample remedy for any violation of the covenants by any member or any breach of peace attempted by any nonmember State. No State can live for any considerable time cut off from the rest of the world. America can come nearer doing it and can continue longer than any other because we produce a surplus of the prime necessities of life under existing conditions. If our markets are done away with, however, that situation would be changed. If other nations should refuse to take our surplus, need it though they would, production would soon diminish.

I venture the prediction that in all the years to come, in actual practice, military force will not be found necessary to restrain any law-breaking nation and prevent it from disturbing the peace of the world. The cooperation of all other nations to completely isolate such a nation, refuse all intercourse or communication with it, will be sufficient.

Under article 22 mandatories, willing to accept their responsibilities, are provided to serve the colonies and territories. This is a very wise disposition of what might be a troublesome problem without it.

COST OF THE LEAGUE.

It will be necessary for the members to contribute to the expenses of the league. This should constitute no objection. If the league accomplishes anything approaching expectations, the amount expended in its maintenance and for carrying on its work will be a nominal sum in proportion to the benefits. When we consider the enormous cost of maintaining the military establishments of the various countries at the beginning of the war just ended, and the fact that they were increasing year by year, a large portion of which may be dispensed with and saved to the taxpayers if this league is agreed to, we will have no hesitation in appropriating our proportion. Our Regular Army grew from 1,200 in 1790 to 100,000 in 1914, and our Navy from nothing to the third largest in the world. Already the Secretary of the Navy has reduced his program by some 10 battleships and 7 cruisers in contemplation of such a league. The cost of one cruiser would more than cover our share of annual league expense. Before entering the war we were spending some $281,000,000 on our Army and Navy Establishments annually. France was paying out about $344,000,000, Great Britain about $386,000,000, and Germany about $443,000,000. No return in the shape of earnings or revenue were derived from these annual outlays. The money came from the taxpayers and none of it went back. It was an investment of the people's money in that protection, a large portion of which, at least, will be guaranteed by the covenants of this league of nations—this agreement with the other Governments for their common benefit. To be more exact, the following are the figures:

Prewar annual war expenditures.
(Not including pensions.)

GREAT BRITAIN.

Year ending March 31, 1914:
Army	$142,000,000
Navy	244,000,000
Total	386,000,000

FRANCE.
(Budget.)

Year ending December 31, 1914:
Army	$241,000,000
Navy	103,000,000
Total	344,000,000

ITALY.
(Budget.)

Year ending December 31, 1913:
Army	86,000,000
Navy	40,000,000
Total	126,000,000

UNITED STATES.

Year ending June 30, 1916:
Army	$125,000,000
Navy	156,000,000
Total	281,000,000

GERMANY.

Year ending March 31, 1914:
Army	323,000,000
Navy	120,000,000
Total	443,000,000

Total for these five countries, annually, $1,480,000,000. This is in part only of the material side of the question. The association in binding contract with the other nations, whereby the lives of the bravest and best of all lands shall be saved, suffering and sacrifice avoided, is the really important consideration.

American interests and American independence are adequately safeguarded.

If for any unforeseen reason the league should prove disappointing, article 1 provides:

> Any member of the league may, after two years' notice of its intention so to do, withdraw from the league, provided that all its international obligations and all its obligations under this covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of its withdrawal.

OTHER OBJECTIONS.

The objection that America has only one vote while small countries have the same is not well taken. It is not reasonable to assume that those countries would be unfriendly to us. The requirement in important matters of a unanimous vote should suffice to insure against combinations and prejudice. For practical, crude illustration, suppose some country should undertake to raise a quarrel with us because of our immigration laws. We would contend the question of immigration is a domestic one and the league is without jurisdiction. The matter is taken up by the council. Let us assume, for argument, that the council is composed of weak or worse members, and they unanimously decided against us. We would decline to be bound by their recommendation. Suppose the complaining State would declare war against us. We would be in no worse position than we would be if we had never entered the league of nations. It is true we could obtain no assistance from the other members of the league. We would be obliged to defend ourselves alone, but we would expect to do that, league or no league. On the contrary, we are not justified in indulging in so violent a presumption, and beyond question the council would hold in accordance with our contention that immigration is purely a domestic question as to which the league has no jurisdiction. The same is true of any other matter "solely within the domestic jurisdiction" of any party, as provided in article 15.

In general, then, this proposed league provides a method for the peaceful settlement of international disputes. The essential covenant permits delay for arbitration, or inquiry, before any hostilities begin.

By such inquiry and delay war was averted between France and Germany over Morocco differences in 1905.

By this means the Balkan difficulties were adjusted in 1912.

We can well conceive that if there had occurred delay and conference in July, 1914, Austria might not have declared war on Serbia and set the world on fire.

The covenants of the league compel that course which will in all human probability prevent war.

In 1914 to 1916 the President negotiated and the Senate consented to some 20 treaties with as many governments, which provided for arbitration and delay.

We regarded the idea a sound one then; it is just as wise to-day. It was necessary to provide for the enforcement of the covenants, which is done. The evils of competitive armament are recognized and a plan for reduction is set forth. Experience has shown that it is most important to eliminate secret treaties and intrigues, and that is taken care of.

The doctrine that backward peoples constitute a sacred trust of civilization is truly expressed and the machinery is set forth for discharging that trust.

America has responsibilities which extend beyond her borders. It must be considered that it is not enough for a nation that it live to itself and have no enemies. It is necessary that a State should have some friends. Cooperation and good will are desirable. One receives only as he gives. "Generosity makes friends—grateful and enduring friends."

IF THE LEAGUE FAILS.

If this league of nations is rejected, or if it is amended, or if reservations or conditions inconsistent with its terms are made, which would destroy it—and that would be the purpose—there will be stricken down the finest thing for the future that it was possible to get out of the most extensive and cruel war of all time. If this treaty with the league of nations in it is rejected, it means the peoples of the earth will be told war is inevitable—get ready for the next one, soon to come. "Lay burdens on your taxpayers in order to maintain and increase your standing armies and your navies!" They will be further told human nature is so weak, ignorance is so dense, hearts are so cold, the advance of the race so meager that there is no escape from the Rob Roy plan:

> Let him take who has the power,
> Let him keep who can.

I do not agree to such conclusions. I believe it is possible, in very large measure, if not absolutely, to prevent any serious war involving any considerable number of people, or seriously affecting the peace of the world, by a plan of cooperation such as is contemplated in the proposed league of nations. I feel quite certain it is feasible, and now is the time to reduce armaments throughout the world and devote the money heretofore required in that connection to better uses.

Those who have experienced the agonies of this war are prepared to enter into covenants pledging their good offices and their good faith to do the necessary things, when occasion arises, to prevent anarchy, to uphold obligations, to maintain international law and order, and give a chance for mankind to make progress.

If we share, or even sacrifice, some right to independent action, and in exchange gain support to our fundamental policies and essential principles, we in no wise modify our form of government or surrender any established rights.

I believe this proposed alliance will accomplish the enlightened purposes indicated and prove a blessing to all the members of the league.

Two men threw a detested representative of the Crown out of a window of the Sprague Palace. Followed the 30 years' religious war which came to an end by the treaty of Westphalia, in 1648. There has been no religious war since. A conflagration started by an incident like that mentioned should be controlled and stopped in the beginning.

June 28, 1914, one man was assassinated in a Bosnian town. Followed the most disastrous war in history, the terms of peace being agreed upon just five years to the hour thereafter. I believe the world can be spared the horrors of such a war. If not, the next one will likely mean the extermination of the race. We were forced into it, and pledged to protect our country from the domination of the military power instigating it, pledged to win, we also pledged to secure both a righteous and permanent peace. The President of the United States outlined its issues, commanded our forces, and laid down the basis of settlement. His leadership was accepted by our associates; his vision, counsel, and statesmanship recognized. He saw the war would have been fought in large measure in vain if he came from the peace table after conference with the brightest minds of the age, obliged to say to the people everywhere, there can be no permanent peace this side of the grave.

After 40 years of wandering from Egyptian bondage Moses was at last able to say to the children of Israel, as he directed their attention, "Behold! the Lord thy God hath set the land before thee, go up and possess it." So the President has pointed the way of hope for humanity and assurance for the world. Shall this Senate turn its back and refuse its advice and consent?

It is due the 8,000 gallant American marines who fought at Chateau-Thierry, leaving all but 1,800 on the field, with the result that Paris, France, the world, were saved; it is due the 500,000 heroic Americans on the firing line at the finish, and the 45,000 slain in the Argonne; it is due the 2,000,000 brave American soldiers in France, eager for the combat, the 2,000,000 equally eager in camps here, the 13,000,000 more registered and ready to go; it is due the 286,330 American casualties, and the dead of the Army and Navy, 122,500, their widows and mothers; it is due the 7,450,200 who suffered death in battle in all armies, and the 18,000,000 maimed and crippled, that the enlightened nations of the earth should see to it, on the final settlement of terms, that provision be made whereby never again should any autocrat or military clique be able—

> To pour the sweet milk of concord into hell,
> Uproar the universal peace,
> And confound all unity on earth.

We might afford to spend a million dollars an hour again, but no nation can afford to sacrifice its best and bravest young men.

The crosses that speak of heroism and sacrifice, extending from the English Channel to the Swiss border, reach out their arms in mute appeal to the representatives of civilized peoples to see to it that such slaughter, destruction, and barbarity shall never again blight the earth.

With the security this league will give, peoples great and small, weak and powerful, poor and rich, all alike, without fear because without danger, will be able to work out their own destinies, encouraged and stimulated, and to proceed up the incline of progress with the promise and hope that in due time they may reach that high plane "where shines unobstructed the light of the justice of God."

There was serious and determined opposition to the Constitution of the United States when it was first submitted. Similar arguments were urged against it to those now pressed against the league of nations and the treaty now before us. Dangerous consequences were pictured. None of these undesirable things ever happened. The Constitution has been the model and strength for struggling republics the world over and the rock upon which America has builded.

We must appreciate that civilization has received a terrible wrench. The aftermath of this latest and most destructive of all wars is yet threatening chaos. We should not forget that the world has three times, after reaching a high state of civilization, been plunged into darkness.

There have never been let loose upon the earth so many powers of evil. Not comprehending it would be the worst possible thing that could happen to all, these reckless and maddened forces seem willing to sink the human race into the mediæval night of the tenth century.

United action of nations in support of orderly government against threatened anarchy is now a paramount necessity.

I appeal to the Senate to consent to this treaty as it is presented, and to do so promptly.

TREATY WITH GERMANY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 5) to print 50,000 copies of the treaty with Germany in the English text alone, and without maps, etc., which were, in line 2, to strike out "fifty" and insert "sixty" and, in line 4, to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty."

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

PEACE TREATY AND LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] has requested me to give notice that to-morrow, at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], he would address the Senate upon the topic of the present discussion.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, as it is now nearly 5 o'clock, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, July 25, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, July 24, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We lift up our hearts in gratitude to Thee our Father in Heaven, for that subtle and mysterious quality Thou hast woven into the soul of man we call love, which in times of great crises lifts man out of himself and makes him a hero.

When the Government and its sacred principles are threatened by an insidious foe, it makes him a patriot.

It forms the home and makes it the dearest spot on earth. Through it friendships are formed which never die—hence the congressional family has been stirred to its depths by the passing away of one of its Members.

It is the foundation of the immortality of the soul which brings comfort and solace to those who are stirred by the passing of a loved one. So we look up to Thee with faith and confidence in this hour of sorrow. Be with the friends of the deceased. Comfort the stricken widow and children with the blessed hope that sometime, somewhere, they shall feel the touch of his hand, hear his voice, and rejoice in his presence.

Hear us, we pray Thee, and so comfort and guide us on our way to the blessed reunion with our friends and loved ones; and all glory and praise shall be Thine through Him who died and lives, thus proving that life is stronger than death. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill H. R. 6810, the prohibition-enforcement law.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the prohibition-enforcement law. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including an address of Assistant Secretary of Agriculture Ousley on the question of meat prices.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein an address of the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 7413) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. J. WILLARD RAGSDALE, late a Representative from the State of South Carolina.

Resolved, That a committee of 10 Senators be appointed by the Vice President to join a committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 75. Joint resolution authorizing the appointment of an ambassador to Belgium.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 75. Joint resolution authorizing the appointment of an ambassador to Belgium; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. On what subject?

Mr. HULINGS. The purpose of my address will be to call the attention of the House and of the country to a resolution which I introduced yesterday asking the Food Commission whether they have advised or directed the retail sugar dealers of the United States——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection if the gentleman will only speak. His explanation is longer than the speech. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker, it was precisely the information that I was giving the gentleman from Missouri that I desire to bring to the attention of the House. The retail sugar dealers in this town and throughout the country are refusing to sell more than 2 pounds of sugar to customers at one time, when we are just at the opening of the canning season. They are doing this sort of thing, and I am advised that there is no occasion for a scanty use of sugar; that there is no shortage in the United States, although there may be in other countries throughout the world; that the Government has bought the entire production of Cuba until the 1st of January, and the whole scheme seems to be just a part of the profiteering scheme of the sugar refiners to increase the price of sugar, to make the people believe that there is a great shortage of sugar. I think, too, it is just part of a scheme by which for some reason or other they keep in the warehouses of the United States Government great quantities of meat and other foods that are not allowed to be put on the market for fear that it will reduce the market price of meat.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULINGS. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Is it not a fact that the War Department has now invited all of the municipalities of the country to make bids on all these canned goods and all these canned meat products to sell them to the consumers at cost?

Mr. HULINGS. No; not to the consumers, but to the municipalities, if they will buy a carload at a time. I do not want a carload in my house at a time.

Nobody can buy surplus Government automobiles, except automobile manufacturers; surplus Government lumber rots because the Government will not sell for fear it will interfere with the lumber barons; the sugar refiners are fixing it up now to raise the price of sugar a little later. There is no scarcity of sugar in this country now nor at any time heretofore. There is not now nor heretofore any need for stringent limitations in its use. When the people were led to believe that many such limitations were necessary to success in the war they stood for it patiently, but when there is no further demand, except the greed and rapacity of profiteers, they are plenty good and tired of it all.

COMMITTEE TO ATTEND FUNERAL OF LATE REPRESENTATIVE RAGSDALE.

The SPEAKER appointed the following committee to attend the funeral of the late Representative RAGSDALE:

Mr. LEVER, Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina, Mr. WHALEY, Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina, Mr. DOMINICK, Mr. STEVENSON, Mr. CLARK of Missouri, Mr. FLOOD, Mr. MCKEOWN, Mr. ROBINSON of North Carolina, Mr. PHELAN, Mr. ROGERS, Mr. FOCHT, Mr. LONGWORTH, and Mr. BROWNE.

PRINTING OF THE TREATY OF PEACE.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I call up concurrent resolution No. 5, which I send to the desk and ask to have printed.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 5.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 50,000 copies of the treaty with Germany in the English text alone and without maps, 10,000 of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives and 40,000 for the use of the Senate.

With the following committee amendments: Line 2, strike out "fifty" and insert "sixty" and in line 4 strike out "ten" and insert "twenty."

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, does the resolution provide how these shall be distributed?

Mr. KIESS. No.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think they ought to go to the folding room.

Mr. KIESS. They go to the folding room.

Mr. EMERSON. Does the gentleman think that is enough? I have a great many demands, so many that it would take my quota now to fill them. They are coming in every day.

Mr. KIESS. This gives a Member 45 in addition to the 18 that he now has.

Mr. EMERSON. My 18 are gone already.

Mr. KIESS. The gentleman will get 45 in addition to his 18.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ASSIGNMENTS OF MAJORITY MEMBERS TO STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I sent to the Clerk's desk a list of nominations to standing committees and a resolution the adoption of which I move.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the following-named Members be, and they are hereby, elected members of the standing committees of the House, as follows:

Agriculture: J. Kuhio Kalanianaole, of Hawaii.
Coinage, Weights, and Measures: J. Kuhio Kalanianaole, of Hawaii.
District of Columbia: Thomas S. Williams, of Illinois.
Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture: Nathan L. Strong, of Pennsylvania; Caleb R. Layton, of Delaware.
Expenditures in the Department of Commerce: Ernest R. Ackerman, of New Jersey.
Expenditures in the Interior Department: S. Wallace Dempsey, of New York.
Expenditures in the Department of Justice: Andrew J. Hickey, of Indiana; Earl C. Michener, of Michigan.
Expenditures in the Department of Labor: L. J. Dickinson, of Iowa; Hays B. White, of Kansas.
Expenditures in the Navy Department: Walter H. Newton, of Minnesota; Amos H. Radcliffe, of New Jersey.
Expenditures in the Post Office Department: Frank L. Smith, of Illinois.
Expenditures on Public Buildings: Israel M. Foster, of Ohio.
Expenditures in the State Department: Henry W. Temple, of Pennsylvania.
Expenditures in the Treasury Department: James T. Begg, of Ohio.
Invalid Pensions: Edward S. Brooks, of Pennsylvania.
Labor: Robert E. Evans, of Nebraska.
Military Affairs: J. Kuhio Kalanianaole, of Hawaii.
The Territories: James G. Monahan, of Wisconsin; J. Kuhio Kalanianaole, of Hawaii.
War Claims: John C. Kleczka, of Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

CLERKS TO COMMITTEES.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask consideration for the following privileged resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 133.

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives compensation at the rate of $6 per diem during the sessions of the Sixty-sixth Congress for services of one clerk to each of the following-named committees: Committee on Expenditures in the Department of State, Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce, Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Labor, Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture, Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, and Committee on Reform in the Civil Service; said compensation to commence from the time such clerk entered upon the discharge of his duties, such time to be ascertained and evidenced by a certificate signed by the chairman of the said committee.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Line 3, strike out the words "$6 per diem" and insert in lieu thereof the words "$150 per month." Line 3, after the word "the," strike out the word "sessions" and insert in lieu thereof the words "first session."

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman when these appropriations begin to run, the 19th of May or subsequently?

Mr. IRELAND. It might have been on the 19th of May; I can not give the accurate days of the several committees, but many of them have been at work for some time. Some have not, some only just a short time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the resolution fix any condition with reference to when the appropriations shall begin to run?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes, sir; from the date of the employment of the clerk, as evidenced by the certificate of the chairman of the committee to that effect.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. I will.

Mr. GARNER. Was there any testimony before the committee showing that these various committees intend to perform the functions for which they were appointed?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes; seven committees are provided with clerks in this resolution. The chairman of each committee, save two, appeared before the Committee on Accounts personally, and I have interviewed those other two chairmen several times or the members of their committees.

Mr. GARNER. They are going to make the investigation such as is contemplated by this resolution?

Mr. IRELAND. Without exception, they so assured us.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendments.

The question was taken, and the committee amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 7413, the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Agricultural appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 7413. An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the amendment to the bill be reported.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks that the Senate amendment to the bill be reported. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 102, after line 7, insert:

"That any homestead settler or entryman who, during the calendar year 1919, finds it necessary to leave his homestead to seek employment in order to obtain food and other necessaries of life for himself, family, and work stock, because of great and serious drought conditions, causing total or partial failures of crops, may, upon filing with the register and receiver proof of such conditions in the form of a corroborated affidavit, be excused from residence upon his homestead during all or part of the calendar year 1919, or the current year of such homestead which may fall principally in the year 1919, and in the making of final proof upon such an entry absence granted under this act shall be counted and construed as constructive residence by said homesteader."

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, the amendment read is self-explanatory, and in order to expedite the passage of the bill——

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. I do.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman explain what the language "during the current year any part of which falls within the calendar year of 1919" means? What does the current year mean in that connection?

Mr. HAUGEN. Well, the calendar year 1919.

Mr. WALSH. It says during the current year any part of which falls within the calendar year of 1919. That may mean the current fiscal year and may bring it over into 1920.

Mr. HAUGEN. I think this is intended for 1919.

Mr. WALSH. I would like the gentleman to explain the amendment where it says "current year."

Mr. MANN. Unfortunately the men who go on a homestead do not always go the 1st of January. Length of residence on a homestead is by year, and the current year would be the year in which this absence occurs, based upon the time the homesteader claims he resided upon his homestead. This provision with reference to residence for the current year means provided most of the current year lies within the year 1919, as I understand it. The current year might commence May 1.

Mr. WALSH. Of this year?

Mr. MANN. Several years ago. It may have commenced several years ago. The current year with the homesteader is the year beginning with the date which is the anniversary of the date when he claims he went on the homestead.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Then the language "or the current year of such homestead which may fall principally in the year 1919," in the gentleman's opinion, would not extend it beyond December 31, 1919?

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether it would extend it the balance of the current year or not. The amendment, as I understand it——

Mr. MONDELL. It might have that effect if the current year began at a date which carried it beyond January.

Mr. MANN. And, of course, it usually does.

Mr. MONDELL. But the bulk of the year must come within the year 1919.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] a question. How did the Agricultural Committee ever get hold of this proposition?

Mr. HAUGEN. The committee reported the bill back to the Senate with this amendment. The Senate agreed to the amendment, and the bill is here.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What bill?

Mr. HAUGEN. The Agricultural bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] yield to me a moment?

Mr. HAUGEN. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, a condition of unprecedented drought extends over all of the northern portion of the Rocky Mountain States. It is most trying in the State of Montana. The so-called "dry farms"—and most of the homesteaders have farms of that character—have produced but very little. Widely extended regions have produced little or nothing in the way of crops this year. There is a very serious condition existing there and one that demands, in my opinion, the relief sought by this amendment to the Agricultural bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. About how many people are affected by this amendment?

Mr. MONDELL. Many thousands.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What change is proposed by this?

Mr. MONDELL. Owing to drought conditions under which the farmer can not live upon the land, because he is unable to make a living on it, he is excused from residence upon it for this year.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does it affect any other industry than farming?

Mr. MONDELL. None but the homesteader.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. The situation being one of such clear merit, does the gentleman think there would have been any difficulty in securing consideration of such a proposition from the committee of the House having jurisdiction of the subject and having some familiarity with the land laws?

Mr. MONDELL. None at all, I think.

Mr. CRAMTON. And I take it, therefore, that the gentleman's remarks are directed to the approval of the proposition itself, rather than to its being attached to an appropriation bill as a rider, where it has no business whatever?

Mr. MONDELL. That is entirely true.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is there a considerable exodus of the people on account of this condition?

Mr. MONDELL. It is absolutely necessary for the homesteaders in very considerable areas to seek employment elsewhere.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Do they leave the State?

Mr. MONDELL. Not always. In some cases they do.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, ordinarily I would not be in favor of any amendment dealing purely with a public-land matter being attached to an Agricultural bill. Of course, the Committee on Agriculture does not have jurisdiction of this subject, and of course under ordinary circumstances they would be apt to make a mistake in dealing with it, and ordinarily it would be a dangerous thing for them to do. But this amendment shows on its face clearly what it is. It is not hard to understand; it is not long; it is not difficult; it is not technical. It merely grants, as I understand it—and I have just had a conference with the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands—temporary leaves of absence to homesteaders who are in a drought-stricken condition on these homesteads. It only applies during this calendar year. It does not go beyond that. No harm can come from it. It ought to be done. They are struggling to secure a home; this will help them. Now, the worst that could possibly happen would be that they would be given the right to get away until January 1, 1920, and have an opportunity to earn something for themselves. Their crops have failed; the drought is most severe. They deserve this and more.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Would the Committee on Public Lands, of which the gentleman was long chairman and is now a prominent member, have any hesitation about giving consideration to the same kind of a measure?

Mr. FERRIS. That is true, and I am sure the chairman of the committee would be glad to do it now. But there are times when drought conditions are acute, and this is one of the times. Northern Montana is experiencing now what my section experienced last year. In the Northwest they are suffering seriously now, and I have no doubt that the Public Lands Committee could and would pass a joint resolution like that, and no doubt it would go to the Senate and pass there and finally become a law. But this is an instance of an amendment that shows on its face precisely what it is, and we can do what we would not do ordinarily and take a short cut in order to give immediate relief. I hope the House will concur in the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. Under the general law, would not the homesteader get a leave of absence?

Mr. FERRIS. Only for six months at a time and with considerable red tape. It is also true he would not get credit while he was away under existing law.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Is there a motion pending?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has not yet made a motion.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I was about to make it, but I was taken off my feet.

Mr. Speaker, in order to expedite the passage of the bill, and in order that we may have an expression from the House, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the House concur in the Senate amendment. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes; I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, the explanation made by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] is very much to the point. This is a matter that ought to be favorably considered by the House. But he did not go far enough in explaining one feature of it, and that is how long a man may be gone. The gentleman from Illinois brought that out, the meaning of the current year as applied to a homestead.

I want to call attention to just the length of time a man is allowed to be away, and extend the explanation a trifle. The expression "or current year of such homestead" seems to puzzle some Members. For instance, suppose I took a homestead three years ago on the 1st of May. The "current year" of that homestead would be from the 1st of May of that year to the 1st of May of the next year, and the current year of that homestead the next year would be from the 1st of May of the second year to the 1st of May of the third year. Now, when the homesteader began with the 1st of May of this year, his current year would extend to the 1st of May, 1920.

This provision says he may be excused from residence on his homestead during all of the calendar year 1919 "or the current year of such homestead which may fall principally in the year 1919." He can be excused during the current homestead year, which begins May 1, 1919, and ends May 1, 1920. He is allowed to get back any time within that current year, providing that the principal part of his current year falls within this year. If he started out on the 2d day of July, the principal part of it would not fall in this year. Therefore it would not work. But if, prior to the 1st of July, he finds it necessary on account of drought to leave his homestead, he may be excused if necessary for the "current year," and that means up to June 30 of the following year, which is 1920.

I speak of this because there was a little confusion on that point. I hope the provision will pass. These people need the relief.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, the bill before us, the Agricultural appropriation bill, was prepared and reported to this House by the Committee on Agriculture. It was passed before the 1st of July, although we did not receive the veto of it until about the 12th of July. It is not now a law, and that has resulted in suffering by the department on account of the delay.

Now, in that state of things there comes back to the House this bill with an amendment tacked on to it dealing with a subject over which the Committee on Agriculture has no jurisdiction whatever and with which it has no familiarity; and still under this state of pressure, when we realize the necessity of disposing of the bill without further delay, we are confronted with this amendment that has never been considered by any committee of Congress having any familiarity with the subject. It is an important amendment that may serve as an important precedent hereafter for action. I want to protest, although I know protest will be ineffectual because of the apparent wisdom of the amendment on its face and the desire for quick progress.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. CRAMTON. I will yield for a brief question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The gentleman says the amendment has not been considered by any committee of Congress.

Mr. CRAMTON. Having jurisdiction of the subject.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Did not the Senate committee consider it?

Mr. CRAMTON. No committee having jurisdiction of this subject of public lands and homesteads has dealt with it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is my purpose to make a motion, not with any alluring hope that it will be adopted, but to voice my protest against what seems to me to be the growing habit of attaching riders that are not germane to appropriation bills and letting them go through Congress without consideration by any committee familiar with the subject or having any jurisdiction of it. Therefore I shall move—I do not know that the chairman yielded to me at this time for that purpose—but at the proper time I shall move to refer the bill with this amendment to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this amendment, but as a matter of fact homesteaders under the general law can secure leaves of absence on account of failure of crops. However, there is one feature that has not been brought out wherein this changes the general homestead law.

Under the general homestead law where a man secures a leave of absence he does not get credit for the time of absence at time of making final proof. This amendment changes the principle that runs throughout the public-land laws, that if a man secures a leave of absence for six months or a year he does not have credit for that time in his final proof. In view of the distressed conditon of these homesteaders an emergency exists and the amendment of the Senate should be adopted.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. EVANS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope that this amendment will carry. The conditions in all that northwestern country, including Montana and parts of Wyoming, Idaho, western Washington, and northern Utah and part of Colorado, are simply deplorable. The drought has struck us there for two or three years. There has been a great immigration in there for the past five or six years, and a lot of people have taken homesteads on what are called dry lands. Those people are absolutely incapable of making a livelihood on their land.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Yes. Certainly.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I would like the gentleman to explain, what is unexplained thus far, why it is that you propose to excuse these homesteaders from residence by reason of this drought and do not deduct the time that they are excused from the length of time they are required to live on their homesteads under the general law.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I think it would be manifestly unfair, when the drought has stricken that country so that people can not live there for the next six months, to compel them, when they come back, to make up the time which they have lost on that account. You ought to allow them to go away and come back and go on as though nothing had happened. Last year we relieved the miners of America from doing their assessment work for the period of a year. So during the panic years of 1893–4 they were relieved from doing their assessment work, and when they came back you did not make them do the extra $100 worth of work.

Conditions are so deplorable out in this country that the railroads have granted people reduced fares to enable them to get out of the State, to find employment temporarily, and have granted them reduced freight rates in order to enable them to get their stock into some place where it can be fed. The streams have gone dry, there is no water in the wells, and they can not live there. So evidently they ought to be allowed to go away to some place where they can make a living. [Applause.]

This amendment does not carry a dollar of appropriation and it will not cost the Government a cent. We recently appropriated millions to feed starving Europe; surely we can not do less than lighten the rigors of the homestead laws in this emergency and allow these people to leave their holdings for a few months to earn a livelihood for themselves and families. [Applause.]

Mr. DENISON. Is this the region of country where Secretary Lane wants the returned soldiers to take up homestead claims?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I think perhaps part of this country is; and if Secretary Lane can reclaim the waters that run unimpeded to the sea and put them on the land, there is no finer or more productive country in the world. I hope you will grant him money to reclaim these lands. [Applause.] But this year the clouds were cruel and did not let the water down, and the poor devils out there are starving, and Congress ought to take a hand and give them leave of absence and not sit here and talk. [Applause.]

Mr. DENISON. Does not the gentleman think we ought to get the water onto the land before we send the soldiers out there?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I think so; yes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. This is a matter that I do not know anything about and that a great many other Members do not know anything about. I am merely trying to have explained that feature of this bill which I understand is contrary to the provisions of the general law. My question does not indicate antagonism to this proposition; I wish to know why it is that if under ordinary conditions people have to make up the time that they are away from their claims those in this drought-stricken district should not do it now? Do I understand that under the general law, in the case of a drought, if a man leaves by reason of the drought he has to make up that time? I so understand from the statement of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. EVANS of Montana. There is no general law that I know of which covers the case. He could get leave of absence for five months, and now we extend that leave of absence for the rest of this year, and he does not have to make up the time of his leave of absence. Under the circumstances I hope the motion will be carried.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. RIDDICK].

Mr. RIDDICK. Mr. Speaker, there should be no confusion about this, because it is a very simple proposition. Under our homestead law a man who goes onto a homestead claim has to live there and develop his land for a certain period of time. If he absents himself, that time is charged against him, and very properly. The purpose of this amendment is to give temporary relief because of a peculiar and serious situation. A very severe drought prevails in the Western States and many of these homesteaders can not remain upon their land. There is no crop to harvest. There is no hay or grass for the cattle and horses. There is no water in the wells. These people must leave their homesteads for a period of time and seek work elsewhere in order to live. This amendment merely provides that the time that they are absent because of these cruel conditions shall not be charged against them while they are away, but that they shall be credited with constructive residence. An amendment was prepared by a Senator covering this matter. Then a substitute was prepared by Secretary Lane, and that substitute was adopted by the Senate, and is the amendment we are now considering. I mention that so we may all know the amendment has been considered and is favored by the Interior Department. I have word from the secretary of Secretary Houston of the Agricultural Department this morning, saying that he is thoroughly familiar with this matter and is in favor of it. So we have the Senate in favor of it, the Interior Department in favor of it, and the Agricultural Department in favor of it.

The people out West are suffering great privations, and this is an effort to mitigate their sufferings so far as we can. It is an emergency proposition. I am aware that the procedure is somewhat unusual, if not irregular. But at this time, when we are willing to break all precedents to feed the hungry and alleviate the sufferings of peoples of foreign lands, even to the giving of hundreds of millions of dollars, I am sure none of us will permit a mere matter of irregular procedure to stand in the way of giving this small relief to our own people in the drought-stricken sections of our Northwestern States.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RIDDICK. I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I have just received a message from Hon. Thomas Hall, secretary of state of North Dakota, which confirms all that the gentleman has said about the failure of the crops in sections of the Northwest, including portions of North Dakota.

Mr. RIDDICK. I have received literally hundreds of letters and telegrams from farmers, merchants, and bankers, all saying the condition is most serious and unusual. One old-time resident of Montana, a well-known man, writes me that in the 52 years that he has lived in that section of the country he has never known conditions to be so bad as they are now. These homesteaders merely desire to remove from their homesteads temporarily to places where they can get work to support themselves and to better improve their homesteads. They will go back as soon as they can, and the only thing this amendment does is to permit them to leave temporarily and at the same time maintain constructive residence. I earnestly hope the amendment will pass. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. RUBEY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, I understand a motion has been made to concur in the Senate amendment. I hope that motion will prevail. We are confronted with the fact that the Agricultural Department is waiting for its money, and it is important that we pass this bill and send it to the President at the earliest possible moment. The amendment put on by the Senate is an important one, and the only possible objection that can be made to it is that it is not germane to the Agricultural bill. Yet we are confronted with a very serious condition in the drought-stricken area of the Northwest that Congress ought to meet, and I hope we will concur in the Senate amendment and pass the bill at once.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, as stated by the gentleman from Montana, because of drought conditions causing a failure of crops, there are thousands of people in the western section of the country who are destitute, without food and without feed for their stock this year, the amendment simply giving them an opportunity, upon proof of such conditions existing, to leave their homestead in order to obtain work elsewhere to provide their families with food and their stock with feed.

I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands with the Senate amendment. That is a preferential motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the bill and amendment be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The question being taken, the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

On motion of Mr. HAUGEN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment was concurred in was laid on the table.

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York submits a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 171.

Resolved, That the Speaker appoint a select committee of six Members of the House, and that such committee be authorized and directed to inquire into the operations of the United States Shipping Board and the United States Emergency Fleet Corporation, or any agency, branch, or subsidiary of either; said inquiry shall include an investigation of contracts, leases, expenditures, receipts, and any and all transactions of the said United States Shipping Board, the Emergency Fleet Corporation, and any other corporations, firms, individuals, or agency in any way associated with or controlled or regulated by the said board or Emergency Fleet Corporation. For the purpose of said inquiry the committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, administer oaths and affirmations, take testimony, to sit during the sessions of the House or during any recess of the House, and may hold its sessions at such places as the committee may determine.

Said committee shall have the right at any time to report to the House in one or more reports the result of its inquiry, with such recommendations as it may deem advisable.

The Speaker is hereby empowered to issue subpœnas to witnesses upon the request of the chairman of said committee at any time, including any recess of the House, during the inquiry of the committee; and the Sergeant at Arms is hereby empowered and directed to serve all subpœnas and other processes transmitted to him by the said committee.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to see if we can not make an agreement as to time for debate on the rule.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I wish the gentleman could withhold that until I can ask the gentleman from New York a question.

Mr. CRAMTON. I will withhold it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Would not the gentleman be willing to accept an amendment to the resolution making the committee consist of seven members, four Republicans and three Democrats?

Mr. SNELL. No, sir; I would not.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does not the gentleman think that would be fair?

Mr. SNELL. I do not know why.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Because four and three makes a better committee than four and two.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I think this is an important discussion, and I shall have to insist on my point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan makes the point of no quorum, and obviously there is no quorum present.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were closed, and the Sergeant at Arms was directed to notify absent Members.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Ashbrook	Fairfield	Kennedy, R. I.	Platt

Ellsworth	Kelley, Mich.	Parker	Wood, Ind.

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and nine Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I want to see if we can not agree on some time for debate on the resolution.

Mr. POU. I would suggest to the gentleman that we have 30 minutes on a side.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this resolution be limited to 30 minutes on a side, 30 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] and 30 minutes by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time for debate on the rule be limited to 1 hour, 30 minutes to be controlled by himself and 30 minutes by the gentleman from North Carolina. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, House resolution 171, if adopted by the House, provides for the appointment of a committee of six members. That committee is directed to inquire into the operation of the Shipping Board, the United States Emergency Fleet Corporation, or any agency, branch, or subsidiary of either; said inquiry to include the investigation of contracts, leases, expenditures, receipts, and any and all transactions of the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation. The resolution itself sets forth fully its object, and needs no further explanation from me.

The Emergency Fleet Corporation was the largest individual governmental activity during the war. This organization will spend, by the time this program is completed, three and a quarter billions of dollars, practically one-tenth of the entire cost of the war. We will have a plant investment of machinery and other equipment worth $225,000,000, and when the total program is completed we will have 2,349 ships, with a total dead-weight tonnage of 13,900,000 tons. And on account of this enormous expenditure of money and the variety of its work, if this resolution is adopted, it is intended to make a complete, businesslike, and systematic congressional audit and investigation of all these activities and inform the people just what we have to show for it; and, as far as I am able to learn, there is no opposition to this investigation on either side of the aisle.

A question has arisen as to why a further investigation of the Shipping Board is needed at this time, when there have been two different investigations already authorized and carried on, one by the Senate and one by the House. The investigation by the Senate was simply for the purpose of trying to expedite the building of ships, and the investigation stopped nearly a year ago, and the greater part of the activity of this board is since then. There was an investigation ordered by the House a few days ago, to be carried on by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, but this was solely for the purpose of getting proper facts and information in order to formulate legislation properly to protect our merchant marine. There has been a great interest in this merchant marine throughout all parts of the country. We have spent a great deal of money in building these ships, and, if I am credibly informed, when this program is completed we will have more tonnage on the ocean than any other nation. And if the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries does well the work it now has mapped out for it it will have all the work that it can possibly do during the present summer; and we must get information necessary in order to pass proper laws to protect our sea-carrying commerce.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Do we know now where we stand, with reference to the operation of the Shipping Board—how much our loss is?

Mr. SNELL. No; we do not at this time, but that is one of the purposes of this investigation. There has been considerable criticism of this organization from all sources. It has probably had more headlines in the newspapers, more publicity, than any other activity of the Government. Perhaps on account of this publicity there is a general interest on the part of all our people throughout the land to know what has become of this enormous amount of money, and whether it was wisely and judiciously expended, and it is simply intended by this resolution to make a straightforward, businesslike investigation so that the people of the whole country may know what we have to show for the expenditure of three and a quarter billions of the people's money. I desire now to place before you some definite evidence why this investigation should be made now and should be a most careful one.

There has been a great deal of criticism in regard to the establishment of various shipbuilding plants, not only the selection of them but the prices that were paid for them. And in this connection I want to direct your attention to one or two specific cases that have been brought to the attention of the committee why the investigation should take place at this time. Information has come to us in regard to the Hog Island proposition, which is not entirely new to this House. We now have an investment there of $66,000,000. We are credibly informed that the original land for the Hog Island shipyards was offered to the Shipping Board by men who controlled the option for a price of $800,000. Three or four months later this same land was purchased by the Shipping Board at a price of $1,700,000.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. For a question.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That land does not belong to the Shipping Board. It belongs to the International Corporation, and the Government has an option to purchase at $1,750,000.

Mr. SNELL. The Government furnished the money, as I understand it, to purchase the land.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The Government does not own it.

Mr. SNELL. It does not make any difference. The money came from this Government. They have spent our money on this land and everybody knows we will have to take it over, and the people of the United States are entitled to know why four months later they bought 60 acres less land for $900,000 more than it was offered to them for earlier in the season, and this investigation will develop that fact.

There has been criticism in regard to the awarding of contracts, and I had a personal experience with the Shipping Board in this matter, and I know there is ground for these complaints. The engineer of a small shipbuilding company near Baltimore came to me and said that they were in a position to build wooden ships; that they had the ways standing idle and they had the ship carpenters; that they had the lumber and other material on hand to build the ships. They knew the business, were willing to build at Government price, had money and everything else to do it with, and the only thing they lacked was an order from the Shipping Board. This gentleman told me that he had been trying to get a contract for several weeks and was unable to get any satisfaction. I went to the Shipping Board for him.

The young man that I was shunted up against said that they did not want any more wooden ships, that they had all the ships contracted for that they wanted. The next morning an interview with Mr. Hurley appeared in the newspaper in which he was quoted as saying that they wanted more ships, and they were exerting every effort to get them. That day I obtained unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes, and I called the attention of the House to the statement of Mr. Hurley and also my experience with the Shipping Board of the day before. A few days afterwards I saw another interview. I again called the attention of the House to the matter, and a few days after the second interview a man came to see me and asked me who was the shipbuilding concern that I referred to. I told him, and a short time afterwards these people were called to the office of the Shipping Board and received a contract, but whether they received it in time to build anything or whether it was canceled I am unable to state at the present time.

There has been severe criticism in regard to the commandeering of ships. There has been a definite statement made along this line by Edgard Luckenbach, who is at the head of the Luckenbach Steamship Co. This company was engaged in coastwise trade and also shipping to Australia. Mr. Luckenbach states that his ships were commandeered by the Shipping Board at the beginning of the war. The understanding was with him that they would return them to him if not needed by the Government. Instead of their being returned to him, however, they were turned over to a rival corporation, and the vice president of this rival corporation was the chairman of chartering committee of the United States Shipping Board. These boats instead of being used by the Government were turned over to this rival corporation and engaged in Australian trade during the time of the war, and Mr. Luckenbach, who owned the ships, was not able to carry on his business, and the rival concern occupied and obtained all of the trade. This certainly needs some explanation.

There has been considerable criticism with regard to the disposition of boats. I have information I desire to give to the committee along that line, and this information comes direct from Mr. Hurley in a letter with his signature, and I take it to be correct. The steamship Redcloud was delivered to the Shipping Board at Jacksonville, Fla., on August 28. This boat arrived in New York Harbor on October 30. The repairs to the vessel are estimated to have cost in the neighborhood of $50,000. The boilers are reported as unsatisfactory on account of their poor design and workmanship, and the division of operations recommended that it was not practical to operate the ship. Another steamer that was built by same company, same place, and in the same way was on the ocean only four days when it needed $50,000 worth of repairs, and was then sold for $200,000.

These ships originally cost the United States Government practically $700,000, and a ship that cost $700,000, on the ocean four days, that needs $50,000 repairs and then sells for $200,000 is certainly a thing about which the people are entitled to have some explanation as to why such things could happen. There was some screw loose in the management somewhere. I also have here an exhaustive report of certified public accountants examining into the cost of two ships. I will not take the time to read that report, but I will call the attention of the House to some of the items that have gone into making up the cost of the ships, as is shown by this report. For instance, there is charged up in the cost of ship, as this report shows, the money paid for band concerts, glee clubs, athletic expenses, house dues—charges at various clubs of a social nature by individual members of the organization, police ball tickets, football tickets, expenses at Army and Navy football game——

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I will.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Are these ships built on the cost-plus basis to which the gentleman refers?

Mr. SNELL. They are built on the cost-plus basis, and not only met this charge, but they added 10 per cent profit. Contributions to various organizations, such as chambers of commerce, and so forth, membership dues, assessments, campaign for merchant marine, subscriptions to the Elks' convention, subscriptions to St. John's Church, and so forth, and, mind you, gentlemen, they charge 10 per cent profit on each one of these subscriptions and contributions. They not only made themselves a good fellow at the Government's expense, but they made a profit on it.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. Do these figures show how much per ship is recommended to be charged off?

Mr. SNELL. If I remember correctly, on these ships about a million dollars was to be charged off; the people buying them would not stand for that much of the expenses charged up against the ships by the Government. I simply want to show to the House, after the generosity of Congress in appropriating money for the purpose of building ships, after the generosity and patriotism of our people in subscribing to bonds and furnishing money to pay these appropriations, if there has been such carelessness and waste as these items indicate it is certain the American people are entitled to know, and we propose to bring it out in this investigation and perhaps get some of this money back into the Treasury. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SNELL. For a question.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. In this matter of what was charged back, a million dollars——

Mr. SNELL. I understand the people who were buying the ships from the Government refused to stand for about a million dollars of expenses the Government had charged up to these two ships.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Was the Government reimbursed for any of that charged back? I want to understand what the gentleman means by "being charged back."

Mr. SNELL. The people, a firm in New York that intended to buy those two ships from the Government——

Mr. HARDY of Texas. At cost?

Mr. SNELL. At cost. Were allowed to put expert accountants to look over the figures which went to make up the cost of those ships, and this is the report of those accountants of the various things that they refused to stand for in the cost of the ships.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. As elements of the cost?

Mr. SNELL. As elements of the cost.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I am seeking information.

Mr. SNELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. When they refused to stand for it they were allowed to buy the ships for cost less those items?

Mr. SNELL. That has not been decided, I understand, up to this time.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. At any rate did the Government ever receive any credit from these wrongfully charged items in its trade with the contractors who built the ships?

Mr. SNELL. Not that I know of up to the present time.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Does the gentleman know the final outcome?

Mr. SNELL. I think that is still under discussion and not settled. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time, and desire to ask how much time I have remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has consumed 18 minutes of time and reserves the balance. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, it is not surprising that the steering committee of the majority party in this house has decided to investigate the activities of the United States Shipping Board and also the Emergency Fleet Corporation. If anyone supposed for a moment that this resolution comes as a surprise, such person is mistaken.

I believe it is not very difficult to predict just what this investigation will disclose. You will probably find certain expenditures of money which at this time may not appear to have been necessary; but while that money was being spent we were in a great war, and one reason the great war was brought to an end at so early a date was due to the great expenditure of money the people of this country were willing to make in order to win. The State Department knows that German spies were constantly reporting these great expenditures to their Government. They reported that there appeared to be no end to the amount of money this Nation was willing to spend. Therefore the expenditures were in no sense a waste of money.

The party to which I belong was in power during the time these expenditures were being made. We invite you to make this investigation; we have known all the time that every activity of the administration would be investigated if you were invested with power. Your investigation will only demonstrate the power and efficiency of the Wilson administration during the greatest crisis in the Nation's history. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Your motives, of course, are political. You will hardly deny that. You fear the President, and therefore wish to discredit him. He has done nothing to deserve your malignant ill will, but you have left no stone unturned to embarrass him wherever it was possible to gain a little political advantage. While the war was on you were constantly finding fault with the great measures presented to enable the President to carry on the war. You quarreled and grumbled and found fault on all occasions, but you voted for every one of these measures and then went back to your people and bragged about it. Some have resorted to the meanest sort of criticism of President Wilson. You criticized him because he went to Paris to take part in the framing of the most important treaty ever written by mortal man. This country was vitally interested in that treaty, and yet some of the leaders of the Republican Party in this Chamber publicly criticized the President because he felt it his duty to personally take charge in Paris. Some of you are still indulging in this cheap practice. Time and again you have slurringly referred to his absence from Washington. One of your leaders has gone so far as to introduce a bill forbidding the President to leave the United States during his term of office. Yet many of you went to Europe yourselves—some while Congress was in session—and that was all right. You had no business over there. It was no part of your duties to go to Europe. You went as sightseers or out of mere curiosity or to gain information, and that was all right; but when President Wilson goes to represent the interests of this great Nation he must be criticized, he has neglected his duties, he should have sent some one else. The trouble was, down deep in your hearts you feared the results of his trip to Europe. You feared he would win a great national triumph, and because he is a Democrat some of you, at least, preferred he should fail.

The former Speaker of the House, the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], said the other day that the Republican Party in this Chamber was afflicted with a grouch. In his usual terse way the former Speaker touched the sore spot. This also is the everlasting truth.

When this war broke upon the world the Democratic Party was in power in the United States; we had the flag, not you. The Republican Party will never get over that misfortune. The result is you can not treat President Wilson in a halfway fair manner; you must find fault with everything he does. You even go so far as to dig up the old sectional differences and appeal to the old sectional prejudices in order that you may win. If a cantonment is put in the South you find fault—it ought to have been put somewhere else. It so happened that a number of southern men had had long legislative experience when the Wilson Administration came into power and because of that experience became heads of most of the great committees of the House. You grasped upon that and charged that the South was in the saddle, that other sections were not treated fairly. No sectional legislation was passed, no sectional legislation was at any time even presented, no sectional legislation was even thought of, but you constantly reiterated that the South was in the saddle. You voted for all the great measures reported from the committees headed by these southern men; you bragged about it; you pointed to these votes in telling your constituents how you placed country above power, but some of you take the meanest sort of advantage in trying to dig up the old sectional differences. In that I think you will not succeed. The South has paid the penalty for any error she may have committed in the past. Gladly her sons offered themselves while they were permitted to volunteer, gladly they responded to the provisions of the selective service draft act, thousands of them died and were buried with the Stars and Stripes wrapped about them. They did their best, they could do no more. You will find that the men who served in this war, the men who suffered and fought and saw their comrades die will not permit you to resurrect the bloody shirt in order to gain a mean political advantage. And you do yourselves no credit when you make the attempt.

Now go to it with your investigations. It matters not if this resolution humiliates the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] the chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, whose committee is already partially invested with power to investigate the United States Shipping Board and Emergency Fleet Corporation. Just why you were willing to slap him in the face is hard to understand. Go to it with your investigations, go to the very bottom; if there has been any crookedness President Wilson, above all men, wants to know it. You thought you were going to compromise a Cabinet officer when the leak investigation was ordered. You even cherished a secret hope that you might compromise some one higher up. Some of the members of that "leak committee" were constantly throwing out suggestions that thus and so might happen if the probe went too deep, but the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, defied you to do your worst. We all know the result—a complete vindication of every official concerned.

All this, Mr. Speaker, is part of a system of political propaganda. You are hoping to lay the foundation for political success in the 1920 election. You talk about a congressional audit; what you are digging for is political material, and everybody knows it. All this makes one wonder if there is such a thing as generosity and fair dealing in a contest between political parties. President Wilson has made an honest effort to serve well his country and mankind. Unless something is done to prevent future wars then all the sacrifice of this war is in vain. We stand at the parting of the ways. We must pursue one of two policies; we must continue the contest for military and naval preparedness with other nations or we must come to a common agreement with those nations that we will not go to war, but settle our differences by arbitration. President Wilson is the one man who had the courage to make the attempt to bring civilized nations together in a common agreement. He may have failed; God forbid. He has at least done what he could to safeguard civilization against future wars; to lift from the shoulders of the struggling masses the burden of taxation necessary in military and naval preparedness. This burden is already so great that Bolshevism and anarchy are flourishing as never before. Standing at the parting of the ways, President Wilson said "we will at least make the attempt"; but we find the Republican majority in this Chamber and another Chamber doing what they can to embarrass this great man in this great work. No matter what he does he must be criticized. He is charged with extravagance because of the help he felt it his duty to take along with him. If he plays a game of golf or goes to the theater he is criticized.

I conclude with this prediction: When your investigating committees have finished their work, when you have spent millions more of the people's money in examining the record of the administration, all fair-minded men will agree, first, that the war was won fully a year sooner than anybody expected it to be won; second, that the efficiency of the Navy in placing an Army of more than 2,000,000 men in Europe within a year is without parallel in the annals of mankind [applause on the Democratic side]; third, that never in all history, from the dawn of time down to this good hour, has so great an undertaking ever been handled with so little suggestion of corruption, so little suggestion of dishonesty; and whatever you of the majority in this Chamber may think of President Wilson the generations to come after will link his name with the names of about five of the Nation's greatest Presidents. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I understand I have 12 minutes left.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, if the brilliant results prophesied by the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] are inevitable, I doubt if he would seriously object to having a select committee of the House controlled by the majority party investigate and secure those results. But the gentleman knows, and the country knows, that in conducting many of our so-called war activities—and some of them antedated our entrance into the war—there has been inefficiency and extravagance. There have been differences of opinion as to policy which seriously interfered with the operations of the various activities of the Government, and the Shipping Board is one of the most glaring instances of that. You all recall the differences between Mr. Denman and Gen. Goethals. You recall the various resignations that took place from time to time in this particular department. Now, I think the country is agreed that there should be an investigation to find out how these enormous sums of money have been expended, and whether it has been wastefully expended, and whether or not Government money has been paid to any parties whatever, whether favorites of the administration or aligned with the opposite political party, which, under the law, should be returned to the United States Treasury.

Now, I desire to say that in introducing this resolution I was not prompted in any way by a desire to infringe upon the province of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, for we all have too high a regard for its personnel to encroach upon its jurisdiction, but we all know that we have authorized them to undertake very important work, namely, legislation to promote and advance the merchant marine of this country. That is one of the most important problems confronting the Congress, and it will take the best thought of that committee in order to properly shape legislation, and it was because it would relieve that committee and its chairman of a burden which otherwise they could properly assume that I was disposed to introduce the resolution now before the House. The distinguished gentleman, my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE], who is the only Member of the House who was chairman of a committee when the Republicans were formerly in control, who has resumed his chairmanship, and who has been on that committee, I think, longer than any other member of it, and his colleague, Judge ALEXANDER, of Missouri, the former chairman and now the ranking minority member, will find as they proceed with that work that that committee will have to give it their constant thought and attention in order to properly outline and frame legislation that will be required. The task of the chairman, my colleague Mr. GREENE, will require much time and constant research, with extensive hearings. My colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] will undoubtedly be devoting his entire attention to that problem. His long experience upon that committee, extending, I believe, over a period of 20 years, his wisdom in shaping and assisting to draft legislation relating to the merchant marine of the country, has to a great degree made him an expert upon merchant-marine legislation. But I submit that it would hardly be wise to have the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and especially its able chairman, immersed in an investigation of receipts and expenditures that will last for many, many weeks, inasmuch as they will have a task before them, in drafting most important legislation, that will require careful consideration of many problems having no intimate relation to expenditures and contracts made as a result of the war emergency. That committee must recommend legislation for the future along peace-time conditions.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know of any more important work that the Congress has to do now than to revise the navigation laws of the country?

Mr. WALSH. I stated previously in my remarks that that is one of the most important matters that is pending before this country, and it will require a great deal of study and effort in order to properly shape and draft legislation covering that subject.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to say, as one coming from along the Atlantic coast, that I know of nothing that the people are so much interested in at the present time as the revision of the navigation laws, looking to the reconstruction of our merchant-marine program.

Mr. WALSH. I think if the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries is left to that task under the direction of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE], that there will be reported to this House in the future legislation which will permit the restoration of our ships to the seas and advance and promote in all its varied phases the merchant marine of the United States.

May I not repeat, Mr. Speaker, that I share in every respect the esteem in which the able chairman, Mr. GREENE, is held not only by his colleagues from Massachusetts, not only by the Members of the majority, but by the entire membership of the House. I venture the prediction that he and his committee will bring to the House legislation which will lead to the results so sorely needed, and I know in shaping that legislation my colleague's experience and familiarity with the needs of our shipping will have great weight and be of signal benefit to the committee and the country.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, it would be interesting, to some of us at least, to really know whether the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] agress in toto with his colleague who has just addressed the House upon this matter. I do not see the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] present, however. Perhaps he might not care to express himself if he were present. What the people of this country really want is legislation, and it occurred to me, and has all along, that in this particular matter an investigation, at least in part, of expenditures and receipts on the part of the Shipping Board was essential, absolutely essential, in the proper formulation of legislation. And for that reason I confess I have been unable to understand why it was that the majority party persisted in taking away authority from that committee, many of whose members have grown up here with this merchant-marine legislation and are more familiar than the Members of the House generally with the activities of this Shipping Board and Emergency Fleet Corporation, and conferring it upon a special committee that will have to start in de novo to learn about these propositions. However, that is the responsibility of the majority. We who recognize the chairman of that committee as the greatest living authority in the Republican Party on merchant-marine legislation do not feel that we should sit idly by, however, and not file our protests against what we conceive to be this humiliation which you are placing upon the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE].

Now, there is another phase of the matter, and that is that the same principle of unfairness is contained in this resolution that was contained in your investigating resolution as to the expenditures of the War Department, and on the part of the minority I do protest again against this party injustice. This committee is to consist of six members, four of the majority and two of the minority, a 2-to-1 committee, just as your committee on investigation of expenditures in the War Department was made up. I called your attention then to the fact that when the present minority party constituted the majority party in this House we never indulged, in our investigations, in such unfair methods.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARRETT. I will.

Mr. SNELL. What did the Democratic Party, or the majority party, do in the Sixty-third Congress when they made up the committees on expenditures in the various departments?

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman speaks of the standing committees of the House. They divided all the standing committees of the House in proportion to the membership of the House as nearly as it was humanly possible to do it, and that is what your party has done this time in the appointment of the standing committees of this House.

Mr. SNELL. I am asking you in regard to the standing committees on expenditures. I am asking you—and if I am not right the gentleman will correct me—whether it is not true that the majority party then said they intended to make up those committees in such a way that if the minority members were not present they could not break a quorum; that they were going to expedite the public business; and that that was the reason why they made up those committees in that proportion. If that policy was right then, why is it not right now?

Mr. GARRETT. The standing committees on expenditures had two minority members then.

Mr. SNELL. Two and five.

Mr. GARRETT. Now, in that Congress does the gentleman recall what the Democratic majority was? It was 143, was it not?

Mr. SNELL. Somewhat near that.

Mr. GARRETT. Now, then, in this Congress your standing committees on expenditures consist of 5 and 2, and your majority is 43.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. GARRETT. Surely.

Mr. SNELL. The reason given at that time for making that division of committees was to expedite public business. If that reason was good then, it is good now.

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman here is proposing to create a special committee. I am not complaining about the standing committees of the House. I think the majority party dealt with reasonable fairness as to that. But I say now in these matters involving party questions, political in character, what is the use in trying to deceive ourselves on these propositions? They were conceived in politics. The purpose is to perform partisan political functions. We never, when we were in the majority, treated a minority with any such unfairness. I pointed out, when I was discussing that other resolution, that the last time that that was done was back when the Republicans were in power before, and you then created a partisan committee, a joint committee, on the so-called Ballinger-Pinchot investigation, which consisted of 2 to 1, and upon these special committees you seem to have gone back again to that old principle which you then followed, without any reference to the proportion of the membership on the respective sides of the House.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. I do.

Mr. LONGWORTH. What would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. GARRETT. I would suggest that this investigation be conducted by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is not the point the gentleman is talking about.

Mr. GARRETT. If that is not done, I would suggest a committee of four and three—that is the proportion we gave—or five and four.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman think that the three Members of his side would give a more comprehensive report on this investigation than two?

Mr. GARRETT. Three men can do more work than two. Does the gentleman think it will require four on his side rather than three? Why not make the committee three and two?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not think that any four men will have a harder job than will the four that are selected.

Mr. GARRETT. How about the two Democrats? Are they not going to have anything to do?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, yes.

Mr. GARRETT. It seems to me the committee should be made up in the proportions that have been followed heretofore. Of course, as pointed out by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU], it is not the policy of the minority to in any way undertake to interfere with all the investigations you want. I should not be surprised, however, if you are not going to find a little bit later on, if I might make a friendly prophecy, a lot of business men whose contracts are being held up, largely on account of some of these investigations that you are instituting, who are going to begin to get tired of it when you do not even claim that you expect to find anything that smacks of corruption or fraud on the part of the department.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. I will.

Mr. HASTINGS. Referring to the suggestion that these committees are largely political, I saw it stated in the public press a few days ago that this special committee to investigate war conditions had a representative of the National Republican Committee or the National Republican Congressional Committee before it. What does the gentleman know about it?

Mr. GARRETT. I am a member of that committee, and——

Mr. HASTINGS. I saw such a statement in the papers the other day.

Mr. DOREMUS. If the gentleman will yield——

Mr. GARRETT. I yield to the gentleman——

Mr. DOREMUS. I will answer the question propounded by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] that at a meeting of the subcommittee, of which I am a member, one George G. Hill, a newspaper man, who has been following the committee hearings very closely, admitted that he was on the pay roll of the Republican national committee. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. For a question.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman has suggested that the settlement of certain contracts was being held up on account of certain investigations that are being made. If the contracts are in proper form and a proper settlement is contemplated, why should the settlement be held up because the Congress is investigating the situation?

Mr. GARRETT. Well, I think I can tell the gentleman why. Efforts are being made, you may say, that amount to this, if I understand the situation correctly, to show that, particularly in the War Department, the authorities there surrounded themselves with men who are not charged with being corrupt, but with men who are so weak that they permitted great Republican manufacturers to defraud the country by putting one over on them [applause on the Democratic side], and I have an idea that it is causing those gentlemen to feel that they are being under attack and under suspicion, and they are not moving altogether with the speed in the settlement of these contracts that might be desired.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. Are all manufacturers Republicans, or did the Democratic administration do business with Republican manufacturers only?

Mr. GARRETT. Oh, the Democratic administration did business with all, but I have never heard any suspicion that any Democratic manufacturer was ever thought to have tried to put one over on the Government. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. What about the Eagle boats of that great idealist, Mr. Ford?

Mr. GARRETT. I think the testimony is very clear that Mr. Ford certainly was quite patriotic and did not profit out of his Government in any way.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman from Tennessee use some more of his time?

Mr. GARRETT. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I shall not discuss the merits of this resolution. On its face it is quite apparent that it is intended to discredit the Democratic administration; but one thought occurs to me which has been alluded to only incidentally. One of the most important problems connected with peace reconstruction is the establishment of a merchant marine sailing under the American flag, under American registry, officered by American citizens, and as far as possible manned by Americans. In that is involved the question of our overseas or foreign trade. The majority party, instead of engaging in partisan investigations, should interest themselves in constructive work which will tend to meet the expectations of the American people in the establishment of an American merchant marine. We have built a great merchant marine, and when the program of the Shipping Board shall have been completed it will be greatly augmented. What is now the majority party assisted in the legislation and in the appropriations for the construction of those ships. What shall we do with them? Shall they be dissipated and go under foreign flags? Shall we revert to the condition which existed prior to the World War, when less than 10 per cent of our foreign trade was carried in American ships, or shall we utilize this great opportunity by appropriate legislation so as to make these ships permanently American ships under the American flag and American registry?

It is no answer to the question to anticipate what the Committee on the Merchant Marine may do. I have seen in the press no statement of any action by your steering committee, no expression of concrete intention to legislate upon this subject. This is the first legislation which is brought in, a proposition to investigate for partisan purposes the operations of the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation, created under legislation of a prior Congress.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. I will say to the gentleman that the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries have been working now for six weeks on legislation which has been authorized by the House, and we have been very actively engaged.

Mr. SMALL. Well, that news is very gratifying, and I regret exceedingly that it is marred by the legislation involved in this resolution, which proposes an investigation in the hope of eliciting some information which may be used for partisan purposes to the discredt of the administration.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman from North Carolina yield for a question?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman from North Carolina was a Member of the House in 1911, was he not, and voted for all the resolutions passed by the Democratic majority providing for investigations of Republican administrations, going back I do not know how many years, for partisan purposes, did he not?

Mr. SMALL. I do not vote for everything that is proposed.

Mr. FERRIS. The Republican side needed investigation very much worse than our side does. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMONDS. I have a great deal of respect for my friend from North Carolina. I am sure he wants to be fair.

Mr. SMALL. My time is limited.

Mr. EDMONDS. I will say to my friend that the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries have their work fairly well under way, and apart from what is proposed to have this special committee do the Merchant Marine Committee are investigating the Division of Operations, the Division of Port Facilities, and the Division of Manning and Recruiting, with the idea of producing legislation. Insurance and every other phase of the activities of the merchant marine is being investigated. We had two hearings to-day in the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman has given very interesting information. May I ask for one more piece of information?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. SMALL. Whether the majority members of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries approve of appointing an independent committee for this investigation instead of having it conducted by that committee which is familiar with the subject?

Mr. EDMONDS. I would like to state that several members of the majority of the Merchant Marine Committee, in talking the matter over, concluded that it would be a detriment to have an investigation of this kind in connection with the reconstruction legislation. Understand, I do not mean that the committee in itself disapproved of this investigation, but they did not think the Committee on the Merchant Marine should conduct it.

Mr. SMALL. Perhaps a good Republican would not actively disapprove of this resolution, but the gentleman, just before the last sentence, expressed what I have no doubt is the opinion of the majority members of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries and, I am sure, the opinion of the minority members of that committee.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman is putting the wrong interpretation on my statement. If it had not been for the enormous volume of work confronting the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, that committee would have been very glad indeed to have made this investigation.

Mr. SMALL. I have no doubt that that committee could find time to undertake this investigation. The able chairman and members of the Committee on Merchant Marine are already familiar with the subject and are best equipped to undertake the work.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, man for man, is as well equipped and as efficient as any other committee in the House.

Mr. SMALL. To that I agree.

Mr. ALEXANDER. And is fully as capable of conducting this investigation as any other committee in the House. I think if this matter were investigated thoroughly it would be found that this present movement is no more nor less than a suggestion of want of capacity of that committee to conduct the investigation.

Mr. SMALL. Its capacity for partisan purposes or for general and meritorious work?

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not know of any good reason why the committee might not conduct that investigation. I am sure that if the Democrats controlled the House and the administration was Republican the Members would insist that the duties which logically belong to that committee should be performed.

Mr. SMALL. Does not the gentleman think it would be better for that committee to make the investigation rather than a special and independent committee?

Mr. ALEXANDER. That goes without saying.

Mr. SMALL. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. In reply to the assertion of the distinguished gentleman from Missouri——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired. All time on that side has expired.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] did not oppose the investigation but he opposed the manner in which it is to be made. We all recognize that if it could be an investigation by a committee a majority of whom were Democrats, then he would be satisfied. Of course, we will not submit to that revision. The gentleman from Tennessee opposed the investigation because we did not have more than six members, especially on the division of 4 to 2. If you will read the bill you will notice it is to investigate the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation. There will be two subdivisions to the committee. There must be one for the Shipping Board and one for the Emergency Fleet Corporation, and I would like to know what basis of subdivision you are going to make unless you make it six instead of seven—two Republicans and one Democrat on the first and two Republicans and one Democrat on the second. If you make it seven, as the Democrats insist, you will have an investigating subcommittee that will have an equal representation of the two sides, a thing never heard of before. That is a sufficient answer for putting it six instead of seven.

Many of the gentlemen are considerably stirred up over any sort of investigation because they say it is purely political. The Shipping Board has appropriated for it already $3,252,701,000, a sum that is three times the amount that ever was spent for all the expenses of this Government combined in any one year prior to the war. If any Member here rises now and declares, since there has been no accounting and no audit, under the authority of Congress, of the expenditure of this money up to date, that we have no right to demand an investigation of it, it is a peculiar angle of discussion to me. We are held responsible to the country for this expenditure and the country has a right to know the facts.

The very fact that this enormous amount of money has been voted by the Congress already, and expended, is sufficient reason that we must have the investigation, in justice not only to this Congress and the country, but to the Shipping Board and to the Emergency Fleet Corporation also. If there is nothing crooked in it nobody suffers. If there is anything crooked in it the guilty ought to suffer. No one can resist that simple proposition.

Now, other Democratic Members say that they object to it because it ought to be done by the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee. That can not be. There is no committee to-day in this House that has presented to it so many varied forms of legislation and of such imminent importance, demanding imperative and immediate action, as the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee. The Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee has great problems, among which is the railway problem, but for days the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee has been sitting, holding hearings under various subcommittees; one has charge of fisheries, another charge of insurance, another charge of revision of the navigation laws, and still others various phases of the investigations, and you can not solve one of the most stupendous problems facing us to-day in utilizing American shipping under American laws, building up the American merchant marine, unless this committee can revise in some form the numerous laws that must come before this House. It is physically impossible for that committee at this time to go into the realm of investigation. It would be a wicked waste of the time of the country to take from that committee the time necessary to work on the problems, including the insurance laws, the subvention laws, the questions of American registry of foreign vessels, to work upon the possibility of change of the laws admitting foreign vessels plying in coastwise trade, investigation of dock and harbor facilities, of the personnel of the merchant marine; in a word, the building up of the American merchant marine, and holding our place upon the sea on behalf of American merchantmen and American honor. It is impossible for the committee to add to its work that of investigation, and it would be wrong to put this investigation on that committee.

We must appoint a separate committee. That committee will be rightly divided into two subcommittees of three and three. That is the explanation of that part of the bill over which so much contention has been made. You who do not oppose the investigation certainly can not oppose this resolution. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. POU) there were 89 ayes and 49 noes.

So the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was being taken when Mr. POU demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 288, nays 0, answered "present" 2, not voting 139, as follows:

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I wish to vote "yea."

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present and listening when his name was called?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I was not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. SNELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY] asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CURRY of California. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make an announcement in which I hope the Members of the House will be interested. At the request of the Committee on the Territories, Mr. McPherson, the first engineer of the Alaska Railroad, will exhibit moving pictures of the Alaska Railroad in the caucus room in the House Office Building at half past 8 o'clock to-morrow evening. As chairman of the Committee on the Territories I am authorized to invite the Members of the House and their families to be present on that occasion. The moving pictures will be well worthy of looking at and will be explained by Mr. McPherson. [Applause.]

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 7413. An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WALSH. To ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks upon the resolution just passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the resolution just passed. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for leave to extend my remarks on the subject of the coal situation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the coal situation. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

NEAR EAST RELIEF.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill S. 180, which is the unfinished business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I desire to raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will first report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 180. A bill to incorporate Near East relief.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania raises the question of consideration.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The question of consideration having been passed on once by the House, can it be renewed again while the bill is under consideration?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the fact that the question has been raised on one day does not preclude its being raised on another day.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRAMTON. I desire to make the point of order that inasmuch as the bill in question involves the expenditure of money by the Government for printing the reports and carrying them through the mails free of postage that it is a bill which should be taken up in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and hence can not be taken up direct from the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair without examination of the bill can not decide whether the gentleman's point of order is well taken, but it is too late now to make that point of order, the bill having already been considered by the House. The question is, Shall the bill be now considered by the House?

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania) there were—ayes 75, noes 58.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Obviously there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 175, nays 80, answered "present" 2, not voting 172, as follows:

Mr. STRONG of Kansas with Mr. WILSON of Louisiana.
Mr. RHODES with Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi.
Mr. LUHRING with Mr. ROBINSON of North Carolina.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] is recognized.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. BEGG. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BEGG. Will there be any opportunity given to offer an amendment to this bill providing the previous question carries?

The SPEAKER. There will not.

Mr. BEGG. A further parliamentary inquiry, if I may. Are we to understand that a bill is to be railroaded through this House without any opportunity for debate?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The motion for a previous question is not debatable? There can be no debate on this question?

The SPEAKER. There can be no debate on it now.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then, Mr. Speaker, the bill must be voted up or down under this motion?

The SPEAKER. Certainly; the bill will have to be voted on without amendment if the previous question is ordered. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] demands the previous question.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 101.

The SPEAKER. The House refuses to adjourn.

Mr. FOSTER. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum. It has just developed that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The vote was on the motion to adjourn, and it is not necessary there should be a quorum on that motion.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask that the Chair restate the vote on the motion to adjourn?

The SPEAKER. There were 31 votes in the affirmative and 101 in the negative.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is not a quorum of the House.

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary to have a quorum in order to adjourn.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Some discussion having intervened, I make the point that no quorum is present. This bill can not be passed without a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and sixty-eight Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, and the Clerk will call the roll. This roll call is simply to obtain a quorum. Gentlemen will answer "present" when their names are called.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Alexander	Esch	Kiess	Robinson, N. C.
Andrews, Nebr.	Fairfield	Kincheloe	Rouse
Anthony	Ferris	King	Rowan
Ashbrook	Fitzgerald	Kinkaid	Rowe

Ellsworth	Kettner	Riordan

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and fifty-one Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a preferential motion.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to suspend further proceedings under the call. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CRAMTON. I move that the bill be laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The motion is in order. The gentleman from Michigan moves to lay the bill on the table. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. CRAMTON. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks for a division. Those who desire to lay the bill on the table will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Thirty-seven gentlemen have risen in the affirmative. Those opposed will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Seventy-seven gentlemen have risen in the negative. On this vote the ayes are 37 and the noes are 77.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that the count shows that there is not a quorum present.

Mr. MANN. That does not signify, necessarily.

Mr. CRAMTON. Then I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that that is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. I make the point, Mr. Speaker, that it is dilatory. The House was just dividing.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is a delicate question. There is always a right to have a quorum in the House. Speakers have decided that immediately after a quorum was disclosed by a roll call the point could not be made, but since then there has been business—there has been a division on another question—and the Chair is disposed to think that a Member has always the right to have a quorum on a question. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty Members are present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on laying the bill on the table. As many as favor laying the bill on the table will, when their names are called, answer "aye"; those opposed will answer "no."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 86, nays 166, answered "present" 2, not voting 175, as follows:

So the motion to lay the bill on the table was rejected.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. DOWELL with Mr. LONERGAN.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois with Mr. ROBINSON of North Carolina.

Mr. ANTHONY with Mr. EAGLE.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont with Mr. LINTHICUM.

Mr. HUTCHINSON with Mr. HEFLIN.

Mr. KAHN with Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan with Mr. CASEY.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado with Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania.

Mr. HAUGEN with Mr. CANTRILL.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The motion to lay the bill on the table is lost. The demand for the previous question is pending.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that that is dilatory.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that motion is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is clearly dilatory.

Mr. CRAMTON. There has been intervening business.

The SPEAKER. The question whether the motion to adjourn is dilatory, the Chair thinks, does not depend simply on the time that has elapsed or the business that has intervened. The question is whether the motion is really dilatory or not; and one of the decisions which the Chair thinks is entitled to great weight says that not only should the Chair himself be satisfied that the motion is dilatory, but that the Chair should be satisfied that the House is satisfied that it is dilatory. In the present instance the Chair thinks the House must be satisfied that the motion is dilatory, and the Chair sustains the point of order. [Applause.] The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. CRAMTON. Division, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia makes the point of order that no quorum is present. It is clear that no quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members. Those in favor of the previous question will, as their names are called, vote "yea," those opposed "nay." The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 149, nays 99, answered "present" 2, not voting 179, as follows:

SENATE.

FRIDAY, July 25, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come to Thee in prayer that our inner life may conform to the spiritual fact, that we may be brought by Thy grace into conformity to Thy will, that our minds may work in accord with the divine law, that our consciences may respond to Thine own command, that our hearts may feel the touch of Thy love, that as men whose lives are God centered we may do the work of this day in Thy sight and with Thy blessing. We ask Thee to guide us. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

THE CLAIM OF CHINA.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I hold in my hand an official copy of the claim of China, submitting its reasons for asking for the abrogation of the Chinese-Japanese treaty as it was presented at Paris, and containing the 21 points that Japan has against China. It is a matter about which so much inquiry has developed that I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator if it was not printed in the RECORD as a part of the remarks of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]?

Mr. SPENCER. I think not, and I do not think many Senators have seen it. I have yet to find anyone who has seen it as I showed it to him.

There being no objection, the paper was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CLAIM OF CHINA FOR THE ABROGATION OF THE TREATIES AND NOTES CONCLUDED WITH JAPAN ON MAY 25, 1915.

INTRODUCTORY.

"This claim submits for abrogation by the peace conference the set of treaties and notes made and exchanged by and between the Chinese Government and the Japanese Government on May 25, 1915. (See Appendix 4.)

"These treaties and notes—hereinafter referred to as the 'Treaties of 1915'—were signed by the Chinese Government under pressure of the series of demands known as the 21 demands presented by the Japanese Government on January 18, 1915, and enforced by the Japanese ultimatum delivered to the Chinese Government on May 7, 1915. (See Appendices 2 and 3.)

"Action by the peace conference in respect of these treaties of 1915 is claimed by China for reasons herein elaborated.

PART 1.

"FIRST INSTRUCTIONS" TO MR. HIOKI.

"1. On December 3, 1914, the Japanese minister at Peking, Mr. Hioki, was handed at Tokyo the text of the 21 demands for presentation to the Chinese Government. They were divided into five groups.

"In the 'First instructions given by Baron Kato [then Japanese minister for foreign affairs] to Mr. Hioki,' which were officially published at Tokyo on June 9, 1915 (see Appendix 1), Mr. Hioki was informed that 'In order to provide for the readjustment of affairs consequent on the Japan-German war and for the purpose of insuring a lasting peace in the Far East by strengthening the position of the [Japanese] Empire, the Imperial Government have resolved to approach the Chinese Government with a view to conclude treaties and agreements mainly along the lines laid down in the first four groups of the appended proposals [i. e., the 21 demands]. * * * Believing it absolutely essential for strengthening Japan's position in eastern Asia, as well as for the preservation of the general interest of that region, to secure China's adherence to the foregoing proposals, the Imperial Government are determined to attain this end by all means within their power. You are therefore requested to use your best endeavor in the conduct of the negotiations, which are hereby placed in your hands.'

"'As regards the proposals contained in the fifth group,' Mr. Hioki was informed that they were to be 'presented as the wishes of the Imperial Government,' but 'you are also requested to exercise your best efforts to have our wishes carried out.'

"It is important, however, to state that the proposals in this fifth group were presented to the Chinese Government as demands and not as 'wishes.'

JAPAN'S WAR AIM.

"2. Attention is directed here to these 'First instructions' to Mr. Hioki, because, studied in connection with other indications of Japanese policy in China, they point reasonably to the inference that Japan's dominant aim in the war against the Central Powers was the 'strengthening of Japan's position in eastern Asia' and the Japanese Government were 'determined to attain this end by all means within their power.'

"3. This reference to Japan's war aim is made because it appears desirable to place all the facts before the peace conference in order that a correct decision may be rendered, inter alia, on the pending claim of the Japanese Government for 'the unconditional cession of the leased territory of Kiaochow, together with the railways and other rights possessed by Germany in respect of Shantung Province.'

"If the real object for which Japan entered the war was less the destruction of German imperialism than the creation of a situation enabling her to strengthen her own 'position in eastern Asia by all means within her power,' it is legitimate for China—as the one of the Allied and Associated States that would suffer in the event of the success of the Japanese claim—to urge the rejection of this claim on the ground that Japan entered the war and envisaged its end in a sense at variance with the principles for which the Entente Allies and America have fought and conquered.

PRESENTATION OF THE TWENTY-ONE DEMANDS.

"4. Six weeks had elapsed from the date of the 'First instructions,' when it was decided that a suitable opportunity had occurred for the presentation of the twenty-one demands. This took place on January 18, 1915, following swiftly on the communication of a note from the Chinese minister for foreign affairs in reply to a dispatch from Mr. Hioki. The latter had written to state that the Japanese Government would not recognize the cancellation of the special military zone which the Chinese Government had delimited in connection with the operations of the Japanese forces besieging the small German garrison at Tsingtao within the leased territory of Kiaochow.

"5. This note from the Chinese minister for foreign affairs is the last of a series of six notes (these notes are included in the Appendices to the Memorandum relating to Kiaochow, filed by the Chinese delegation, and numbered 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11) passing between him and Mr. Hioki. These notes dealt not only with the special military zone, but with the protest of the Chinese Government against the forcible and unnecessary seizure by the Japanese of the Trans-Shantung Railway, which dominates the Province of Shantung.

"The whole of this series of notes is important because they connect the twenty-one demands with the situation created in Shantung by the Japanese military authorities in their operations for the reduction of the German "fortress" of Tsingtao.

"This fortress was garrisoned by 5,250 German and Austrian regulars and reservists hastily assembled. Under the plea of military necessity the Japanese forces entered Chinese territory 150 miles to the rear of the 'stronghold.' In the land operations ensuing the Japanese had a total of 12 officers killed and 40 wounded and 324 rank and file killed and 1,148 wounded. In the naval operations one small cruiser was sunk by a mine and 280 of the crew perished. In addition to this disaster the Navy had 40 men killed and wounded.

"These figures are given not in any way to detract from the merit of Japan's principal military achievement during the war, but only to indicate what operations were actually involved in the fall of the fortress.

"6. The note from the Chinese minister for foreign affairs points out that two months have 'elapsed since the capture of Tsingtao; the basis of German military preparations has been destroyed; the troops of Great Britain have already been and those of your country are being gradually withdrawn. This shows clearly that there is no more military action in the special area, and that the said area ought to be canceled admits of no doubt. * * * As efforts have always been made to effect an amicable settlement of affairs between your country and ours, it is our earnest hope that your Government will act upon the principle of preserving peace in the Far East and maintaining international confidence and friendship.'

"7. Within 36 hours of the expression of this earnest hope of the Chinese Government, Mr. Hioki presented to the President of the Chinese Republic a series of demands which the Government and people of China viewed as an act of the same order of policy as the Austrian ultimatum to Serbia that had plunged Europe into war just 24 weeks before.

PART 2.

ANALYSIS OF THE 21 DEMANDS.

"8. An examination of these 21 demands shows that their ruling purpose was to impose on China a settlement not unlike in principle to the one imposed on Korea during the short period preceding the extinction of Korean independence.

Group I.

"9. Group I deals with the Province of Shantung, which is greater in area and in population than the whole of England, besides being a piece of China packed with memories of Confucius and hallowed as the cradle of Chinese culture.

"10. The first demand in this group insists on the Chinese Government engaging to 'give full assent to all matters upon which the Japanese Government may hereafter agree with the German Government relating to the disposition of all rights, interests, and concessions which Germany, by virtue of treaties or otherwise, possesses in relation to the Province of Shantung.'

"At the date of the 21 demands the 'rights, interests, and concessions' of Germany in Shantung included the leased territory of Kiaochow, with the harbor of Tsingtao, the trans-Shantung railway known as the Tsingtao-Chinan Railway or Kiaochow-Tsinanfu Railway, and other railway as well as mining rights in the Province.

"They were the fruits of 16 years of German aggression in Shantung Province, and their transfer to Japan means that the Teutonic methods, which enabled Germany to dominate and exploit the Province, will pass into the hands of a power with a great military base already standing on Chinese soil at Port Arthur.

RAILWAY DOMINATION OF NORTH CHINA.

"11. The meaning of this Japanese succession to German rights in Shantung is best illustrated in the railway situation arising out of Japan's exercise of two of the 'other railway rights' that were vested in Germany.

"Although Japan's claim now before the peace conference, in so far as it relates to China, is confined to the 'railways and other rights possessed by Germany in respect of Shantung Province,' she has pressed (in a set of secret agreement and notes concluded on Sept. 24, 1918) on China the acceptance of the view that her first demand in Group I—which is substantially repeated in her conference claim—covers the German rights to finance, construct, and supply the materials for two lines of railway running into the two other Provinces of Kiangsu and Chihli, though starting in Shantung.

"If the peace conference concede this Japanese claim, the following formidable situation will be created: Through the trans-Shantung Railway, with its western or inland terminus at the provincial capital of Chinanfu where it flanks the northern section of the Tientsin-Pukow Railway—built by the Germans—Japan will at once dominate the whole of Shantung as well as the northern half of this important trunk line. Then, by financing, constructing, and supplying the materials for the first of the aforesaid 'two lines of railway'—i. e., a line from the city of Kaomi, on the trans-Shantung Railway, to a point strategically dominating the southern or British constructed section of the same Tientsin-Pukow Railway—Japan will practically master the great railroad linking Tientsin (the port of Peking) and north China with the Yangtze Valley and south China.

"Next, by financing, etc., the second of the 'two lines of railway'—i. e., a line practically extending the trans-Shantung Railway from Chinanfu, where it will bisect the Tientsin-Pukow trunk line, to a point westward on the Peking-Hankow Railway—Japan will flank the other of the two trunk lines connecting Peking and north China with central and southern China. (It is important to note that the administration of a Japanese constructed railway in China goes far beyond that of any other foreign constructed railway in China, including even those constructed by Germany in Shantung. It means that the railway is practically manned by Japanese, to the exclusion even of Chinese; that the railway is policed by Japanese gendarmerie and is guarded by Japanese troops along its entire length. That is the danger.)

"And when it is borne in mind that Japan also controls the railway systems in south Manchuria and eastern inner Mongolia, the extent of Japan's railway domination of China north of the great line of the Yangtze will be realized.

"This fact also must be noted. It means the isolation of Peking, which will be cut off from central and southern China not only by land but by the sea route, owing to the Gulf of Pechihli—through which Peking can be reached via its port of Tientsin—being directly dominated by the Japanese at Port Arthur.

THE "STRATEGIC REAR" OF WEIHAIWEI.

"12. It is further interesting to note the connection between the third demand in Group I with this strategic situation based on Japan's contemplated railway domination in northern China. The demand requires 'the Chinese Government to agree to Japan's building a railway connecting Chefoo or Lungkow' with the trans-Shantung Railway.

"Look at the map of Shantung and it will at once be seen that, lying obliquely opposite to Port Arthur, is the leased territory of Weihaiwei which Great Britain occupied in order to redress the 'balance of power' in China when Russia seized Port Arthur.

"While China can not but view foreign occupation of Weihaiwei as well as of other leased territories in a sense derogating from her territorial integrity, it is important, even from the Chinese point of view to direct attention to the fact that the strategic value of Weihaiwei could be seriously impaired if the power in possession of Port Arthur were to control either Chefoo or Lungkow, both of which lie to the 'strategic rear' of the British leased territory.

Group II.

ANNEXATION AT WORK.

"13. The seven demands in Group II exact in favor of Japan and her nationals a series of preferential rights, interests, and privileges in South Manchuria and eastern inner Mongolia calculated at once to increase the existing difficulties which seriously hamper effective Chinese administration in these two areas and to develop a situation facilitating the extension thereto of the territorial system which has transformed Korea into a Japanese Province.

"Although all the demands in this group vitally affect the territorial integrity and independence of China in South Manchuria and eastern inner Mongolia, it must suffice here to direct attention only to the first demand which insists 'that the lease of Port Arthur and Dalny and the term of lease of the South Manchurian Railway and the Antung-Mukden Railway shall be extended to a period of 99 years.'

"The extension of these leaseholds means the perpetuation of an alien political system in South Manchuria that immediately menaces the territorial integrity and independence of China. Through Port Arthur—the most powerful citadel in continental Asia—and the commercial base of Dalny which is linked with the South Manchuria and Antung-Mukden lines, Japan politically and commercially dominates a region through which lies the 'historic road of invasions' into China. In the past Asiatic invaders have entered the country from the north; and it was through the Manchurian 'gate' that the last invaders crossed into the great plains of northern China. * * *

"History and a sense of realities seems to suggest a view of the Japanese system in South Manchuria that can not be reconciled with the security of the Chinese Republic. And the opposition between this system of Japan and the safety of China is made sharper by the demand in question. Instead of China regaining Port Arthur and Dalny in the year 1923, as stipulated in the original lease of these places, Japan will continue to retain them until the month of March in the 'eighty-sixth year of the Chinese Republic—that is to say, in the year 1997 of the Christian era" (English version of the treaties of 1915 officially published at Tokyo on June 9, 1915)—the precise month and year when Germany promised to 'return' Kiaochow to China.

Group III.

JAPAN'S IRON POLICY IN CHINA.

"14. Besides involving the violation of the territorial integrity and sovereignty of China in Shantung, South Manchuria, and eastern inner Mongolia, the 21 demands also encroach on Chinese economic independence by their exaction in Group III of an undertaking with respect to the Han-Yeh-Ping Co., or iron works, well calculated to lead to ultimate Japanese acquisition of the most important industrial enterprise in the Yangtze Valley.

"In its final form, as insisted upon in the Japanese ultimatum, the undertaking reads 'that if in future the Han-Yeh-Ping Co. and the Japanese capitalists agree upon cooperation, the Chinese Government, in view of the intimate relations subsisting between the Japanese capitalists and the said company, will forthwith give its permission. The Chinese Government further agree not to confiscate the said company, nor without the consent of the Japanese capitalists to convert it into a State enterprise, nor cause it to borrow and use foreign capital other than Japanese.'

TWO JAPANESE STATEMENTS.

"15. That the economic policy expressed in this Han-Yeh-Ping undertaking means Japanese control of China's natural resources is made clear by two recent Japanese statements. In a pamphlet lately issued in Paris by Baron Makino, then acting senior member of the Japanese peace delegation, the declaration is made that 'China has the raw material; we have need for raw material and we have the capital to invest with China in its development for use by ourselves as well as by China.' This same point was emphasized in an address delivered by Viscount Uchida, the present Japanese minister for foreign affairs, at the opening of the Diet at Tokyo last January:

"'We have to rely,' the minister declared, 'in a large measure, upon rich natural resources in China in order to assure our own economic existence.'

"China does not admit that her natural resources are necessary to assure the economic existence of Japan any more than the 'natural resources' of Alsace-Lorraine were necessary to assure the economic existence of Germany.

Group IV.

"16. The single demand in Group IV required the Chinese Government to 'engage not to cede or lease to any other power any harbor or bay on or any island along the coast of China.'

"In insisting on this demand Japan represented her objects to be the more effective preservation of the 'territorial integrity of China.' It will be seen, however, that the demand is worded in a sense apparently excluding Japan from the category of powers in whose favor the Chinese Government engage not to violate the territorial integrity of China. As a result of the Chinese Government's objection to a demand worded in such a dangerously ambiguous sense the Japanese ultimatum called for a declaration by China that 'no bay, harbor, or island along the coast of China may be ceded or leased to any power.'

Group V.

"17. Finally, we come to the set of seven demands known as Group V. It is an open secret that the existence of these demands was not admitted by Japan when public attention was first drawn to them, and that they were not included in the Japanese communication replying to an inquiry of the great powers regarding the nature and the terms of the 21 demands.

"By this group of demands 'influential Japanese' were to be engaged by the Chinese Government 'as advisers in political, financial, and military affairs.' 'The police departments of important places (in China)' were to be 'jointly administered by Japanese and Chinese, or the police departments of these places' were to 'employ numerous Japanese.' 'China' was to 'purchase from Japan a fixed amount of munitions of war (say, 50 per cent or more) of what is needed by the Chinese Government, or there shall be established in China a Chino-Japanese jointly worked arsenal. Japanese technical experts are to be employed and Japanese material to be purchased.'

"In other words, the Chinese Army, with its illimitable possibilities in man power, was to be organized and controlled by influential Japanese military 'advisers' and was to be equipped and supplied with arms and munitions of Japanese pattern and manufacture.

"18. Railway rights were also demanded in this Group V which 'conflicted with the Shanghai-Hangchow-Ningpo railway agreement of March 6, 1908, the Nanking-Changsha railway agreement of March 31, 1914, and the engagement of August 24, 1914, giving preference to British firms for the projected line from Nanchang to Chaochowfu. For this reason the Chinese Government found themselves unable to consider the demand, though the Japanese minister, while informed of China's engagements with Great Britain, repeatedly pressed for its acceptance.' (Chinese official statement.)

JAPANESE MISSIONARY PROPAGANDA.

"19. Two of the demands in this Group V related to the acquisition of land for schools, hospitals, and temples, as well as to the right of missionary propaganda. They presented, 'in the opinion of the Chinese Government, grave obstacles * * * the religions of the two countries are identical, and therefore the need for a missionary propaganda to be carried on in China by Japanese does not exist. The natural rivalry between Chinese and Japanese followers of the same faith would tend to create incessant disputes and friction. Whereas western missionaries live apart from the Chinese communities among which they labor, Japanese monks would live with the Chinese, and the similarity of their physical characteristics, their religious garb, and their habits of life would render it impossible to distinguish them for purposes of affording the protection which the Japanese Government would require should be extended to them under the system of extraterritoriality now obtaining in China.' (Chinese official statement.)

"Moreover, there was the fear that the 'Japanese monks' might under the guide of missionary propagandists, carry on a political propaganda inconsistent with the maintenance of China's independence.

"A FOREIGN POWER" IN FUKIEN.

"20. A short reference must be made to the demand in this group relating to the Province of Fukien, the acceptance of which—as mentioned in the next section—was included in the Japanese ultimatum, although, according to the 'first instructions' to Mr. Hioki, it was to be presented not as a demand but as a 'wish.'

"The province happens to be the part of China lying nearest to—but at some distance from—the island of Formosa (see map facing p. 6) which was ceded to Japan as a result of her successful war against China in 1894–95. This geographical propinquity is serving as a basis for certain Japanese claims respecting Fukien. One of these claims is that Japan has a sort of right of vetoing any attempt on the part of China to utilize and develop, with foreign capital, the natural facilities on any part of the Fukien coast as a 'shipyard, military coaling station, naval station, or any other military establishment.'

"In the Japanese note relating to Fukien, which is included among the annexes to the treaties of 1915, specific reference is made to a reported intention of the Chinese Government permitting 'a foreign power' (English version of the treaties of 1915 officially published at Tokyo on June 9, 1915) to build a shipyard, etc., in the province. In the course of the discussion on this demand concerning Fukien, the Japanese representative justified its presentation on the ground that his Government understood that the United States was interested in some form of development work in the Province.

MEANING OF "POSTPONED FOR LATER NEGOTIATION."

"21. It is true that, with the exception of the demand relating to Fukien, this Group V was 'postponed for later negotiation' and its acceptance was not demanded in the ultimatum by which Japan stopped further discussion of the 21 demands and insisted on the acceptance of the demands in Groups I, II, III, and IV, subject to certain unimportant verbal variations.

"The ultimatum was delivered to the Chinese Government on May 7, 1915, with the warning that 'in case the Imperial [Japanese] Government fail to receive from the Chinese Government, before 6 p. m. of May 9, satisfactory response to their advice they will take such independent action as they may deem necessary to meet the situation' (English version of the ultimatum officially published at Tokyo on June 9, 1915).'

"Although this postponement of Group V for 'later negotiations' was alleged by the Japanese Government to be 'mark of their good will toward the Chinese Government,' it is known that this course followed representations made to Japan by other powers. The Japanese Government, nevertheless, insisted that the Chinese Government should specifically state in their reply to the ultimatum that Group V had been 'postponed for later negotiation.'

"22. This statement of the case would be incomplete unless it were noted that, since the date of the ultimatum, Japanese policy in China apears to be expressing itself in terms of the specific principles worked out in these demands in Group V 'postponed for later negotiation.'

M. KRUPENSKY'S TESTIMONY.

"23. What Japan means by postponing Group V 'for later negotiation' is made plain by M. Krupensky, Russian ambassador at Tokyo, in two dispatches written by him to his home Government. These dispatches were included among the documents found in the archives of the Russian foreign office and published by the Russian revolutionary government on November 22, 1917.

"M. Krupensky's first dispatch is dated October 16, 1917, and reads as follows:

"'In reply to my question as to the credibility of the rumors alleging that Japan is prepared to sell to the Chinese Government a considerable quantity of arms and munitions, Viscount Motono [then Japanese minister for foreign affairs] confirmed them, and added that the Peking Government had promised not to use the arms against the southerners. It was evident from the minister's words, however, that this promise possessed only the value of a formal justification of this sale, infringing as the latter does the principle of nonintervention in the internal Chinese feuds, proclaimed by Japan herself. * * * It is most likely that the Japanese are aiming principally at obtaining the privilege of rearming the entire Chinese Army, and at making China dependent in the future on Japanese arsenals and the supply of munitons from Japan. The arms to be supplied are estimated at 30,000,000 yen. At the same time, Japan intends establishing an arsenal in China for the manufacture of war materials.'

M. KRUPENSKY'S SECOND DISPATCH.

"The other dispatch is dated October 22, 1917. It is a document of exceptional value, written as it is by one of the ablest members of the Russian diplomatic service, with a great knowledge of both Chinese and Japanese affairs. Before he was appointed to the Russian Embassy at Tokyo, M. Krupensky was Russian minister at Peking; indeed, he filled this office at the time when the 21 demands were presented and negotiated in 1915.

"After remarking that the reported American recognition of Japan's special position in China—then under negotiation at Washington—will 'inevitably lead in the future to serious misunderstandings between us (Russia) and Japan,' the document continues:

"The Japanese are manifesting more and more clearly a tendency to interpret the special position of Japan in China, inter alia, in the sense that other powers must not undertake in China any political steps without previously exchanging views with Japan on the subject—a condition that would to some extent establish a Japanese control over the foreign affairs of China. [It will be remembered that one of the decisive acts preceding the annexation of Korea was the conclusion of the Japan-Korea treaty of November 17, 1905, vesting in the Japanese Government the direction and control of the foreign affairs of Korea.] On the other hand, the Japanese Government does not attach much importance to its recognition of the principle of the open door and the integrity of China, regarding it as merely a repetition of the assurance repeatedly given by it earlier to other powers, and implying no new restrictions for the Japanese policy in China. It is, therefore, quite possible that at some future time there may arise in this connection misunderstanding between the United States and Japan. The minister for foreign affairs confirmed to-day, in conversation with me, that in the negotiations by Viscount Ishii [at Washington] the question at issue is not some special concession to Japan in these or other parts of China, but Japan's special position in China as a whole' [italics added].

JAPAN AND THE LANSING-ISHII AGREEMENT.

"24. In a third dispatch written to the Russian Government under date of November 1, 1917, M. Krupensky explained what the Japanese Government thought regarding the possibility of misunderstanding in the interpretation of the Lansing-Ishii agreement, which recognized Japan's 'special position' and 'special interests' in China. Reporting that he had asked Viscount Motono, Japanese minister for foreign affairs, 'whether he did not fear that in the future misunderstandings might arise from the different interpretations by Japan and the United States of the terms "special mission" and "special interests" of Japan in China,' M. Krupensky stated: 'I gain the impression from the words of the minister that he is conscious of the possibility of misunderstandings in the future, but is of the opinion that in such a case Japan would have better means at her disposal for carrying into effect her interpretation than the United States.'

"The Chinese Government, when furnished with copies of these notes, lodged at Washington and at Tokyo a declaration to the effect that China, having adopted toward friendly nations the principle of justice, equity, and respect for treaty rights, and recognizing special relations created by territorial propinquity only so far as expressed in treaties, would not permit herself to be bound by any agreement made between other nations.

"The interpretation which the United States Government gives to the notes can be inferred from its statement, accompanying the publication of these notes, that these notes 'not only contain a reaffirmation of the open-door policy but also introduce a principle of noninterference with the sovereignty and territorial integrity of China, which, generally applied, is essential to perpetual international peace, as has been so clearly declared by President Wilson.'

PART 3.

ABROGATION OF TREATIES OF 1915.

"25. It is submitted that the treaties and notes signed and exchanged by and between the Chinese and Japanese Governments on May 25, 1915, as a result of the negotiations connected with the 21 demands and of the Japanese ultimatum of May 7, 1915, are and do constitute one entire transaction or settlement arising out of and connected with the war between the allied and associated States and the Central Powers.

"An essential feature of this transaction is the set of demands relating to the Province of Shantung and insisting on the right of Japan to succeed to the leased territory of Kiaochow and the other 'rights, interests, and concessions' of Germany in the Province.

"That this essential feature of the transaction can only be settled by the peace conference is clearly admitted by the Japanese Government, because they have submitted to the conference a claim for 'the unconditional cession of the leased territory of Kiaochow, together with the railways and other rights possessed by Germany in respect of Shantung Province.'

"It follows, therefore, the entire transaction or settlement of which this Shantung claim of Japan forms an essential feature is a matter directly arising out of the war and within the purview of the peace conference and necessarily subject to its revisionary action.

WAR CHARACTER OF TREATIES OF 1915 EMPHASIZED.

"26. The war character of these treaties of 1915 is further attested by the opening sentence of the 'First Instructions' to Mr. Hioki, which reads: 'In order to provide for the readjustment of affairs consequent on the Japan-German war and for the purpose of insuring a lasting peace in the Far East by strengthening the position of the [Japanese] Empire, the Imperial Government have resolved to approach the Chinese Government with a view to conclude treaties and agreements mainly along the lines laid down in the first four groups of the appended proposals.'

"The Japanese ultimatum [English version of the ultimatum published at Tokyo] also begins with a sentence, emphasizing that the demarche is due to the desire of Japan 'to adjust matters to meet the new situation created by the war between Japan and Germany * * *.'

TREATIES OF 1915 SIGNED UNDER COERCION.

"27. The fact that these treaties of 1915 were signed by the Chinese Government of the day does not remove them from the scope of the revisionary authority of the peace conference. Nor can the same operate as an estoppel against China in her claim to be released from them. These treaties were signed by the Chinese Government under coercion of the Japanese ultimatum of May 7, 1915, and in circumstances entirely excluding any suggestion that China was a free and consenting party to the transaction embodied in them.

ABROGATION INVOLVES NO INJUSTICE OR UNFAIRNESS TO JAPAN.

"28. The abrogation of the treaties of 1915 necessarily carries with it the rejection of the pending Japanese claim for the unconditional cession of the German system in Shantung.

"On this point, the submission is made that no injustice or unfairness will be done to Japan in denying her claim to perpetuate German aggression in Shantung. Nor will Japan's failure in this respect place her in a position inferior to that of any of the other powers in 'territorial propinquity' to China, even assuming—which China does not admit—that Japan's 'territorial propinquity' entitles her to claim a 'special position' in China which has never been claimed by Great Britain and France, although their respective Asiatic possessions are also 'contiguous' to the territory of the Chinese Republic.

HOW CHINA WAS PREVENTED FROM INTERVENING IN THE WAR.

"29. It is also submitted that but for the attitude of Japan—inspired largely, it seems, by her desire to replace Germany in Shantung—China would have been associated with the Allies in August, 1914, and again in November, 1915, in the struggle against the Central Powers.

"In August, 1914, the Chinese Government expressed their desire to declare war against Germany and to take part in the Anglo-Japanese operations against the German garrison at Tsingtao. The proposal was not pressed, owing to the intimation reaching the Chinese Government that the proposed Chinese participation was likely to create 'complications' with a certain power.

"Again in November, 1915, the Chinese Government expressed their desire to enter the war in association with the Allies, but the Japanese Government opposed the proposal.

"Eventually, however, the Chinese Government addressed a note of warning to Germany on February 9, 1917, severed diplomatic relations with the latter on March 14 following, and finally declared war against Germany and Austria on August 14, 1917—the opposition of the Japanese Government having been removed in the circumstances indicated in another dispatch written by M. Krupensky to the Russian Government on February 8, 1917, reporting on his efforts to induce Japan to withdraw her opposition to China's entry into the war on the side of the Allies (vide, infra, sec. 34). (In this connection it is right to note China's war services and offer of man power to the Allies and America. During the war a large contingent of Chinese workers labored for the Allies behind the battle lines in northern France. They eventually numbered 130,678. Not a few of them were killed or wounded by enemy operations. In addition to these workers in France a large number were employed in connection with the British operations in Mesopotamia and German East Africa, and the crews of quite a considerable number of British ships consisted of Chinese seamen.

"(Besides placing at the disposal of the allied Governments nine steamers, which were greatly needed for the Chinese export trade, the Chinese Government offered to dispatch an Army of 100,000 to reenforce the man power of the allied and associated States in France. The offer was favorably entertained by the interallied council in Paris, but owing to allied inability to supply the necessary tonnage for transport the proposal eventually could not be carried out.)

"30. Further, it is reasonable to point out that if Japan had not occupied it the leased territory of Kiaochow would in any event have been directly restored to China as one of the States associated with the allied powers and the United States in the war against the Central Powers.

THE CONGRESS OF BERLIN.

"31. The submission is further made that in addition to the foregoing reasons there are precedents justifying the peace conference in dealing with the treaties of 1915 in the sense of abrogation.

"The Congress of Berlin is an instance of the great powers, acting as a whole and collectively, revising a treaty concluded between two States, i. e., Russia and Turkey, for a variety of reasons, but mainly because the settlement dictated by Russia at San Stefano was deemed ultimately to endanger the peace of Europe.

"It is urged that the settlement dictated by Japan at Peking in 1915 endangers directly the peace of far Asia, and ultimately the peace of the world.

A CONFERENCE RULING.

"32. There are two other arguments against the validity of the treaties of 1915. One is based on a ruling of the conference and the other on the lack of finality affecting the treaties.

"By article 1 of the 'treaty respecting the Province of Shantung' (see Appendix 4), which embodies the first of the 21 demands, the Chinese Government engage to recognize any agreement concluded between Japan and Germany respecting the disposition of the latter's 'rights, interests, and concessions' in the Province, and in the notes exchanged regarding Kiaochow (see p. 36) Japan subjects the restoration of the leased territory to the condition inter alia—that 'a concession under the exclusive jurisdiction of Japan [is] to be established at a place designated by the Japanese Government.'

"As regards this article 1 of the treaty, it is important to emphasize the point that Japan is debarred from negotiating separately with Germany in respect of the latter's system in Shantung owing to the decision of the conference to deal with German 'territories and cessions' without consulting Germany.

"On this view it is plain that Japan is not in a position to agree with Germany regarding the 'free disposal' of Kiaochow and that the article in question should be deemed inoperative.

AN ILLUSORY RESTORATION OF KIAOCHOW.

"The same objection applies to the notes exchanged. And even if this were not so, the illusory character of the restoration of Kiaochow contemplated in them would be a proper matter for the consideration of the peace conference in deciding on Japan's claim for the unconditional cession of Kiaochow and the rest of the German system in Shantung.

"The chief value of Kiaochow lies partly in the harbor of Tsingtao and partly in an area dominating the finest anchorage of that harbor, which has been delimited by the Japanese Government and is already reserved for exclusive Japanese occupation under Japanese jurisdiction, no one other than Japanese being permitted to hold land within its boundaries.

"This delimited area, presumably, is the 'place to be designated by the Japanese Government' as 'a concession under the exclusive jurisdiction of Japan.' The restoration of Kiaochow to China, with retention of Japan of the area dominating it, would be the restoration of the 'shadow' of this 'place in the sun' and the retention of its substance by Japan.

LACK OF FINALITY.

"33. Since the date of the treaties of 1915, even Japan has acted on the assumption that they are lacking in finality.

"It is evident that the scheme worked out in the 21 demands and in the treaties of 1915 demanded for its permanance the assent of the great powers with whom Japan was and is under agreement guaranteeing the independence and integrity of China.

"Accordingly, the Japanese Government secured the conclusion of two treaties with Russia in the summer of 1916 (see Appendix 5). One was made public and before its signature was communicated to the British Government. But the other was a secret treaty, consisting of six articles, whereof the last provided that the 'present convention shall be kept in complete secrecy from everybody except the two high contracting parties.' (Commenting on the treaties in its issue of December 24, 1917, a great organ of British public opinion pointed out that there were considerable differences between the public and secret documents: 'The public treaty professes to aim at maintaining a lasting peace in the Far East and makes no reference to China; the secret treaty is not concerned with peace, but with the interests of both contracting powers in China. * * * The public treaty indicates consultation between the contracting parties as to the measures to be taken; the secret treaty points to military measures and is definitely a military alliance.')

"If these significant documents are to be interpreted accurately, they must be studied, particularly the secret treaty, in connection with the Anglo-Japanese treaty of alliance of July 13, 1911. The latter provides, in article 3, that 'the high contracting parties agree that neither of them will, without consulting the other, enter into separate arrangement with another power to the prejudice of the objects described in the preamble of this agreement.' One of these objects is defined to be 'the preservation of the common interests of all powers in China by insuring the independence and integrity of the Chinese Empire and the principle of equal opportunities for the commerce and industry of all nations in China.'

"It is obvious that this specific object of the Anglo-Japanese treaty would be infringed by the political domination of China or any portion the territory of the Chinese Republic by either or both of the contracting parties to the secret Russo-Japanese treaty. And yet this secret treaty in article 1, fails to provide against the 'political domination of China' by either or both Japan and Russia, although a secret military alliance is definitely made by the two powers against the 'political domination of China by any third power.'

"A further comment may be added. Article 2 of the public treaty provides for consultation between Japan and Russia in case their territorial rights or special interests in the Far East be threatened. The specific reference to China in the secret treaty shows that the 'special interests' of the parties contemplated were those recognized by each other as existing in China. There can be no question whatever that under the treaties of 1915 Japan secured valuable territorial rights and special interests in great regions of China, like south Manchuria, eastern inner Mongolia, and Shantung. Indeed, the cumulative effect of these treaties of 1915 is to center in the hand of Japan a 'political domination of China' conflicting with the preamble of the Anglo-Japanese alliance.

FURTHER NEGOTIATIONS WITH RUSSIA.

"34. Further negotiations between Japan and Russia are reported in another dispatch written by M. Krupensky to Petrograd under date of February 8, 1917.

"The ambassador was reporting on his efforts to induce Japan to withdraw her opposition to China's entry into the war on the side of the Allies. After stating that he never omitted 'an opportunity for representing to [Viscount Motono] the Japanese minister for foreign affairs the desirability in the interests of Japan herself of China's intervention in the war' and that the minister had promised 'to sound the attitude of Peking without delay,' M. Krupensky reported that—

"'On the other hand, the minister pointed out the necessity for him, in view of the attitude of Japanese opinion on the subject, as well as with a view to safeguard Japan's position at the future peace conference, if China should be admitted to it (italics added), of securing the support of the Allied Powers to the desires of Japan in respect of Shantung and the Pacific Islands. These desires are for the succession to all the rights and privileges hitherto possessed by Germany in the Shantung Province and for the acquisition of the islands to the north of the equator which are now occupied by the Japanese. Motono plainly told me that the Japanese Government would like to receive at once the promise of the Imperial (Russian) Government to support the above desires of Japan.'

"'In order to give a push,' the ambassador added persuasively, 'to the highly important question of a break between China and Germany I regard it as very desirable that the Japanese should be given the promise they ask.'

THE RUSSIAN PROMISE.

"35. This promise was given in the following communication, dated at 'Tokyo, le 20 février/5 mars 1917:

"'En réponse à la notice du Ministère des Affaires Etrangères du Japon, en date du 19 février dernier, l'Ambassade de Russie est chargée de donner au Gouvernement Japonais l'assurance qu'il peut entièrement compter sur l'appui du Gouvernement Impérial de Russie par rapport à ses desiderata concernant la cession éventuelle au Japon des droits appartenant à l'Allemagne au Chantoung et des îles allemandes occupées par les forces japonaises dans l'Océan Pacifique au nord de l'équateur.'

"36. It is reasonable to suggest that if Japan had at this date regarded, in a sense of finality, the settlement imposed on China in 1915, there would have been no necessity for Japan to insist on allied support of her claim regarding Shantung at the future peace conference.

OTHER ALLIED PROMISES.

"37. The same remark applies to the other promises of support secured by the Japanese Government from Great Britain on February 16, 1917; from France, on March 1, 1917; and from Italy, whose minister for foreign affairs verbally stated on March 28, 1917, that 'the Italian Government had no objection regarding the matter.'

"Without attempting to express here the Chinese sense of disappointment at the conclusion of these agreements at a time when China was definitely aligning herself with the allied and associated States in the struggle against the Central Powers, it is pertinent to state that, in the view of the Chinese Government, these allied promises to Japan in so far as they relate to China can not be deemed binding on Great Britain, France, and Italy on the main ground that China's subsequent entry into the war on August 14, 1917, in association with the Allies and the United States involved such a vital change of the circumstances existing at the dates of the respective promises and of the situation contemplated therein that the principle of rebus sic stantibus necessarily applies to them.

DISCLAIMER BY CHINESE GOVERNMENT.

"38. That the Chinese Government also regarded the treaties of 1915 as lacking in finality is clear from the disclaimer registered in their official statement on the negotiation connected with the 21 demands.

"Although threatened by the presence of large bodies of troops dispatched by the Japanese Government to South Manchuria and Shantung—whose withdrawal the Japanese minister at Peking declared, in reply to a direct inquiry by the Chinese Government, would not be effected 'until the negotiations could be brought to a satisfactory conclusion'—the Chinese Government issued an official statement immediately after this 'satisfactory conclusion' had been effected under pressure of the ultimatum of May 7, 1915, declaring that they were 'constrained to comply in full with the terms of the ultimatum, but in complying the Chinese Government disclaimed any desire to associate themselves with any revision, which may be effected, of the various conventions and agreements concluded between other powers in respect of the maintenance of China's territorial independence and integrity, the preservation of the status quo, and the principle of equal opportunity for the commerce and industry of all nations in China.'

A "UNILATERAL NEGOTIATION."

"39. The foregoing declaration was preceded by an account of the manner in which the negotiations had been conducted or, more accurately, dictated by Japan. It was shown how, faced by 21 demands of a powerful government 'determined to attain this end by all means within their power' and at a selected moment when three of the powers—with whom Japan had severally guaranteed the independence and integrity of China—were engaged in a deadly struggle with the Germanic Kingdoms, China was compelled to enter into a singularly unequal negotiation with Japan.

"It was a negotiation in which the number and virtually the personnel of China's representatives were dictated to her. It was a negotiation in which Japan refused to have official minutes of the proceedings kept as proposed by China, with the result that the Japanese and Chinese representatives differed in their respective records of important declarations made by the latter, and, on the basis of some of these differences, the Japanese Government in their ultimatum accused the Chinese Government of 'arbitrarily nullifying' statements alleged to have been made—but in fact never made—by the senior Chinese representative. It was a negotiation in the course of which—these are the words of the Chinese official statement issued at the time—'the Japanese minister twice suspended the conferences, obviously with the object of compelling compliance with his views on certain points at the time under discussion.' In a word, it was a negotiation in which Japan dominated and dictated the course and the terms of the discussion.

PROTEST BY UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT.

"40. Presumably it was as much this element of harshness as the subject matter of the negotiation which moved the Government of the United States concurrently to address to the Chinese and Japanese Governments, four days after the delivery of the ultimatum to China, the following identic note:

"'In view of the circumstances of the negotiations which have taken place and which are now pending between the Government of China and the Government of Japan and of the agreements which have been reached as a result thereof, the Government of the United States has the honor to notify the Government of the Chinese Republic [Japan], that it can not recognize any agreement or undertaking which has been entered into between the Governments of China and Japan impairing the treaty rights of the United States and its citizens in China, the political or territorial integrity of the Republic of China or the international policy relative to China commonly known as the open-door policy. An identical note has been transmitted to the Japanese [Chinese] Government.'

CONCLUSION.

"Summing up the foregoing arguments, it is submitted that they establish the claim of China for the abrogation of the treaties of 1915—

"I. Because these treaties are and constitute one entire transaction or entity arising out of the war and they attempt to deal with matters whose proper determination is entirely a right and interest of the peace conference;

"II. Because they contravene the allied formula of justice and principles now serving as the guiding rules of the peace conference in its task of working out a settlement of the affairs of nations in order to prevent or minimize the chances of war in the future;

"III. Because, specifically, they violate the territorial integrity and political independence of China as guaranteed in the series of conventions and agreements severally concluded by Great Britain, France, Russia, and the United States with Japan;

"IV. Because they were negotiated in circumstances of intimidation and concluded under the duress of the Japanese ultimatum of May 7, 1915; and

"V. Because they are lacking in finality, being so regarded by Japan who sought to make them final by negotiating—before China was suffered to enter the war in association with the Allies and the United States—a set of secret agreements at variance with the principles accepted by the belligerents as the basis of the peace settlement."

"INSTRUCTIONS HANDED AT TOKYO ON DECEMBER 3, 1914, BY BARON KATO TO MR. HIOKI IN CONNECTION WITH THE TWENTY-ONE DEMANDS AND OFFICIALLY PUBLISHED AT TOKYO ON JUNE 9, 1915.

"First instructions given by Baron Kato to Mr. Hioki.

"In order to provide for the readjustment of affairs consequent on the Japan-German war and for the purpose of ensuring a lasting peace in the Far East by strengthening the position of the Empire, the Imperial Government have resolved to approach the Chinese Government with a view to conclude treaties and agreements mainly along the lines laid down in the first four groups of the appended proposals. Of these, the first group relates to the settlement of the Shantung question, while the second group has for its chief aim the defining of Japan's position in south Manchuria and eastern inner Mongolia—that is to say, securing at this time from the Chinese Government full recognition of Japan's natural position in these regions, absence of which has hitherto been the cause of various questions tending to estrange the feelings of the two peoples toward each other. The object of the third group is to safeguard the best interest of the Han-Yeh-Ping Co., with which Japanese capitalists are closely identified. It will thus be seen that there is nothing especially new in our proposals embodied in the foregoing three groups, while as regards the fourth group, it is only intended to emphasize the principle of China's territorial integrity, which has been so often declared by the Imperial Government.

"Believing it absolutely essential for strengthening Japan's position in Eastern Asia as well as for preservation of the general interests of that region to secure China's adherence to the foregoing proposals, the Imperial Government are determined to attain this end by all means within their power. You are, therefore, requested to use your best endeavor in the conduct of the negotiations, which are hereby placed in your hands.

"As regards the proposals contained in the fifth group, they are presented as the wishes of the Imperial Government. The matters which are dealt with under this category are entirely different in character from those which are included in the first four groups. An adjustment at this time of these matters, some of which have been pending between the two countries, being nevertheless highly desirable for the advancement of the friendly relations between Japan and China as well as for safeguarding their common interests, you are also requested to exercise your best efforts to have our wishes carried out.

"It is very likely that in the course of these negotiations the Chinese Government desire to find out the attitude of the Imperial Government on the question of the disposition of the leased territory of Kiaochow Bay. If the Chinese Government will accept our proposals as above stated, the Imperial Government may, with due regard to the principle of China's territorial integrity and in the interest of the friendship of the two countries, consider the question with a view to restoring the said territory to China in the event of Japan's being given free hand in the disposition thereof as the result of the coming peace conference between Japan and Germany. As, however, it will be absolutely necessary, in restoring the said territory to China, to lay certain conditions such as the opening of the territory for foreign trade, establishment of a Japanese settlement, etc., you will ask for further instructions when you propose to declare to the Chinese Government the willingness of the Imperial Government to consider the question.

"[N. B. Here follow the 'appended proposals' or twenty-one demands, divided into five groups, for a translation of which from the Chinese text, vide Appendix 2.]

"No. 2.

"JAPAN'S 21 DEMANDS.

"Japan's original demands, handed to His Excellency the President Yuan-Shih-kai by His Excellency, Mr. Hioki, the Japanese Minister to China, on January 18, 1915, translated from the Chinese text and published by the Chinese Government at Peking in June, 1915.

"I.

"The Japanese Government and the Chinese Government being desirous of maintaining the general peace in Eastern Asia and further strengthening the friendly relations and good neighborhood existing between the two nations agree to the following articles:

"ARTICLE 1. The Chinese Government engages to give full assent to all matters upon which the Japanese Government may hereafter agree with the German Government relating to the disposition of all rights, interests, and concessions which Germany, by virtue of treaties or otherwise, possesses in relation to the Province of Shantung.

"ART. 2. The Chinese Government engages that within the Province of Shantung and along its coast no territory or island will be ceded or leased to a third power under any pretext.

"ART. 3. The Chinese Government consents to Japan's building a railway from Chefoo or Lungkow to join the Kiaochow-Tsinanfu Railway.

"ART. 4. The Chinese Government engages, in the interest of trade and for the residence of foreigners, to open by herself as soon as possible certain important cities and towns in the Province of Shantung as commercial ports. What places shall be opened are to be jointly decided upon in a separate agreement.

"II.

"The Japanese Government and the Chinese Government, since the Chinese Government has always acknowledged the special position enjoyed by Japan in South Manchuria and Eastern Inner Mongolia, agree to the following articles:

"ARTICLE 1. The two contracting parties mutually agree that the term of lease of Port Arthur and Dalny and the term of lease of the South Manchurian Railway and the Antung-Mukden Railway shall be extended to the period of 99 years.

"ART. 2. Japanese subjects in South Manchuria and Eastern Inner Mongolia shall have the right to lease or own land required either for erecting suitable buildings for trade and manufacture or for farming.

"ART. 3. Japanese subjects shall be free to reside and travel in South Manchuria and Eastern Inner Mongolia and to engage in business and in manufacture of any kind whatsoever.

"ART. 4. The Chinese Government agrees to grant to Japanese subjects the right of opening the mines in South Manchuria and Eastern Inner Mongolia. As regards what mines are to be opened, they shall be decided upon jointly.

"ART. 5. The Chinese Government agrees that in respect of the (two) cases mentioned hereinbelow the Japanese Government's consent shall be first obtained before action is taken:

"(a) Whenever permission is granted to the subject of a third power to build a railway or to make a loan with a third power for the purpose of building a railway in South Manchuria and Eastern Inner Mongolia.

"(b) Whenever a loan is to be made with a third power pledging the local taxes of South Manchuria and Eastern Inner Mongolia as security.

"ART. 6. The Chinese Government agrees that if the Chinese Government employs political, financial, or military advisers or instructors in South Manchuria or Eastern Inner Mongolia, the Japanese Government shall first be consulted.

"ART. 7. The Chinese Government agrees that the control and management of the Kirin-Changchun Railway shall be handed over to the Japanese Government for a term of 99 years dating from the signing of this agreement.

"III.

"The Japanese Government and the Chinese Government, seeing that Japanese financiers and the Hanyehping Co. have close relations with each other at present and desiring that the common interests of the two nations shall be advanced, agree to the following articles:

"ARTICLE 1. The two contracting parties mutually agree that when the opportune moment arrives the Hanyehping Co. shall be made a joint concern of the two nations, and they further agree that without the previous consent of Japan, China shall not by her own act dispose of the rights and property of whatsoever nature of the said company nor cause the said company to dispose freely of the same.

"ART. 2. The Chinese Government agrees that all mines in the neighborhood of those owned by the Hanyehping Co. shall not be permitted, without the consent of the said company, to be worked by other persons outside of the said company; and further agrees that if it is desired to carry out any undertaking which it is apprehended may directly or indirectly affect the interests of the said company the consent of the said company shall first be obtained.

"IV.

"The Japanese Government and the Chinese Government, with the object of effectively preserving the territorial integrity of China, agree to the following special article:

"The Chinese Government engages not to cede or lease to a third power any harbor or bay or island along the coast of China.

"V.

"ARTICLE 1. The Chinese Central Government shall employ influential Japanese as advisers in political, financial, and military affairs.

"ART. 2. Japanese hospitals, churches, and schools in the interior of China shall be granted the right of owning land.

"ART. 3. Inasmuch as the Japanese Government and the Chinese Government have had many cases of dispute between Japanese and Chinese police to settle cases which caused no little misunderstanding, it is for this reason necessary that the police departments of important places (in China) shall be jointly administered by Japanese and Chinese or that the police departments of these places shall employ numerous Japanese, so that they may at the same time help to plan for the improvement of the Chinese police service.

"ART. 4. China shall purchase from Japan a fixed amount of munitions of war (say 50 per cent or more) of what is needed by the Chinese Government or that there shall be established in China a Chino-Japanese jointly worked arsenal. Japanese technical experts are to be employed and Japanese material to be purchased.

"ART. 5. China agrees to grant to Japan the right of constructing a railway connecting Wuchang with Kiukiang and Nanchang, another line between Nanchang and Hanchow, and another between Nanchang and Chaochou.

"ART. 6. If China needs foreign capital to work mines, build railways and construct harbor works (including dockyards) in the Province of Fukien, Japan shall be first consulted.

"ART. 7. China agrees that Japanese subjects shall have the right of missionary propaganda in China."

"No. 3.

"JAPAN'S ULTIMATUM TO CHINA.

"Japan's ultimatum delivered by the Japanese Minister to the Chinese Government on May 7, 1915, translated from the Chinese text published at Peking in June, 1915.

"The reason why the Imperial Government opened the present negotiations with the Chinese Government is first to endeavor to dispose of the complications arising out of the war between Japan and Germany, and, secondly, to attempt to solve those various questions which are detrimental to the intimate relations of China and Japan with a view to solidifying the foundation of cordial friendship subsisting between the two countries to the end that the peace of the Far East may be effectually and permanently preserved. With this object in view, definite proposals were presented to the Chinese Government in January of this year, and up to to-day as many as 25 conferences have been held with the Chinese Government in perfect sincerity and frankness.

"In the course of the negotiation the Imperial Government have consistently explained the aims and objects of the proposals in a conciliatory spirit, while, on the other hand, the proposals of the Chinese Government, whether important or unimportant, have been attended to without any reserve.

"It may be stated with confidence that no effort has been spared to arrive at a satisfactory and amicable settlement of those questions.

"The discussion of the entire corpus of the proposals was practically at an end at the twenty-fourth conference; that is, on the 17th of the last month. The Imperial Government, taking a broad view of the negotiation and in consideration of the points raised by the Chinese Government, modified the original proposals with considerable concessions and presented to the Chinese Government, on the 26th of the same month, the revised proposals for agreement, and at the same time it was offered that, on the acceptance of the revised proposals, the Imperial Government would, at a suitable opportunity, restore, with fair and proper conditions to the Chinese Government the Kiaochow territory, in the acquisition of which the Imperial Government had made a great sacrifice.

"On the 1st of May, the Chinese Government delivered the reply to the revised proposals of the Japanese Government, which is contrary to the expectation of the Imperial Government. The Chinese Government not only did not give a careful consideration to the revised proposals but even with regard to the offer of the Japanese Government to restore Kiaochow to the Chinese Government the latter did not manifest the least appreciation for Japan's good will and difficulties.

"From the commercial and military points of view Kiaochow is an important place, in the acquisition of which the Japanese Empire sacrificed much blood and money, and, after the acquisition the Empire incurs no obligation to restore it to China. But with the object of increasing the future friendly relations of the two countries, they went to the extent of proposing its restoration, yet to her great regret, the Chinese Government did not take into consideration the good intention of Japan and manifest appreciation of her difficulties. Furthermore, the Chinese Government not only ignored the friendly feelings of the Imperial Government in offering the restoration of Kiaochow Bay, but also in replying to the revised proposals they even demanded its unconditional restoration; and again China demanded that Japan should bear the responsibility of paying indemnity for all the unavoidable losses and damages resulting from Japan's military operations at Kiaochow; and still further in connection with the territory of Kiaochow China advanced other demands and declared that she has the right of participation at the future peace conference to be held between Japan and Germany. Although China is fully aware that the unconditional restoration of Kiaochow and Japan's responsibility of indemnification for the unavoidable losses and damages can never be tolerated by Japan yet she purposely advanced these demands and declared that this reply was final and decisive.

"Since Japan could not tolerate such demands, the settlement of the other questions, however compromising it may be, would not be to her interest. The consequence is that the present reply of the Chinese Government is, on the whole, vague and meaningless.

"Furthermore, in the reply of the Chinese Government to the other proposals in the revised list of the Imperial Government, such as South Manchuria and Eastern Inner Mongolia, where Japan particularly has geographical, commercial, industrial, and strategic relations, as recognized by all the nations, and made more remarkable in consequence of the two wars in which Japan was engaged, the Chinese Government overlooks these facts and does not respect Japan's position in that place. The Chinese Government even freely altered those articles which the Imperial Government, in a compromising spirit, have formulated in accordance with the statement of the Chinese representatives, thereby making the statements of the representatives an empty talk; and, on seeing them conceding with the one hand and withholding with the other, it is very difficult to attribute faithfulness and sincerity to the Chinese authorities.

"As regards the articles relating to the employment of advisers, the establishment of schools and hospitals, the supply of arms and ammunition, and the establishment of arsenals and railway concessions in South China, in the revised proposals they were either proposed with the proviso that the consent of the power concerned must be obtained or they are merely to be recorded in the minutes in accordance with the statements of the Chinese delegates, and thus they are not in the least in conflict either with Chinese sovereignty or her treaties with the foreign powers; yet the Chinese Government, in their reply to the proposals, alleging that the proposals are incompatible with their sovereign rights and treaties with foreign powers, defeat the expectations of the Imperial Government. However, in spite of such attitude of the Chinese Government, the Imperial Government, though regretting to see that there is no room for further negotiations, yet warmly attached to the preservation of the peace of the Far East, is still hoping for a satisfactory settlement in order to avoid the disturbance of the relations.

"So, in spite of the circumstances which admitted no patience, they have reconsidered the feelings of the Government of their neighboring country and, with the exception of the article relating to Fukien, which is to be the subject of an exchange of notes, as has already been agreed upon by the representatives of both nations, will undertake to detach the Group V from the present negotiation and discuss it separately in the future. Therefore the Chinese Government should appreciate the friendly feelings of the Imperial Government by immediately accepting without any alteration all the articles of Groups I, II, III, and IV and the exchange of notes in connection with Fukien Province in Group V as contained in the revised proposals presented on the 26th of April.

"The Imperial Government hereby again offer its advice and hope that the Chinese Government, upon this advice, will give a satisfactory reply by 6 o'clock p. m. on the 9th day of May. It is hereby declared that if no satisfactory reply is received before or at the specified time, the Imperial Government will take steps they may deem necessary.

"Treaty respecting south Manchuria and eastern inner Mongolia.

"His Excellency the President of the Republic of China and His Majesty the Emperor of Japan having resolved to conclude a treaty with a view to developing their economic relations in south Manchuria and eastern inner Mongolia, have for that purpose named as their plenipotentiaries, that is to say:

"His Excellency the President of the Republic of China, Lou Tseng-Tsiang, Chung-ching, first class Chia-ho decoration, and minister of foreign affairs; and his Majesty the Emperor of Japan, Hioki Eki, Jushii, second class of the Imperial Order of the Sacred Treasure, minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary;

"Who, after having communicated to each other their full powers and found them to be in good and due form, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

"ARTICLE 1. The two high contracting parties agree that the terms of the South Manchuria Railway and the Antung-Mukden Railway shall be extended to 99 years.

"ART. 2. Japanese subjects in south Manchuria may, by negotiation, lease land necessary for erecting suitable buildings, for trade and manufacture, or for prosecuting agricultural enterprises.

"ART. 3. Japanese subjects shall be free to reside and travel in south Manchuria and to engage in business and manufacture of any kind whatsoever.

"ART. 4. In the event of Japanese and Chinese desiring jointly to undertake agricultural enterprises and industries incidental thereto the Chinese Government may give its permission.

"ART. 5. The Japanese subjects referred to in the preceding three articles, besides being required to register with the local authorities passports, which they must procure under the existing regulations, shall also submit to the police laws and ordinances and taxation of China.

"Civil and criminal cases in which the defendants are Japanese shall be tried and adjudicated by the Japanese consul; those in which the defendants are Chinese shall be tried and adjudicated by Chinese authorities. In either case an officer may be deputed to the court to attend the proceedings. But mixed civil cases between Chinese and Japanese relating to land shall be tried and adjudicated by delegates of both nations conjointly, in accordance with Chinese law and local usage.

"When in future the judicial system in the said region is completely reformed, all civil and criminal cases concerning Japanese subjects shall be tried and adjudicated entirely by Chinese law courts.

"ART. 6. The Chinese Government agrees, in the interest of trade and for the residence of foreigners, to open by China herself, as soon as possible, certain suitable places in eastern Mongolia as commercial ports.

"ART. 7. The Chinese Government agrees speedily to make a fundamental revision of the Kirin-Changchun Railway loan agreement, taking as a standard the provisions in railway loan agreements made heretofore between China and foreign financiers.

"When in future more advantageous terms than those in existing railway loan agreements are granted to foreign financiers in connection with railway loans the above agreement shall again be revised in accordance with Japan's wishes.

"ART. 8. All existing treaties between China and Japan relating to Manchuria shall, except where otherwise provided for by this treaty, remain in force.

"ART. 9. The present treaty shall come into force on the date of its signature. The present treaty shall be ratified by His Excellency the President of the Republic of China and His Majesty the Emperor of Japan, and the ratifications thereof shall be exchanged at Tokyo as soon as possible.

"No. 5.

"RUSSO-JAPANESE TREATIES OF 1916.

"In July, 1916, Japan and Russia entered into a public treaty, the terms of which were communicated to the British Government before signature. The terms of this agreement, as published in the Times on July 8, 1916, are as follows:

"'The Imperial Government of Japan and the Imperial Government of Russia, resolved to unite their efforts for the maintenance of lasting peace in the Far East, have agreed upon the following:

"'"ARTICLE 1. Japan will not be a party to any political arrangement or combination directed against Russia.

"'"Russia will not be a party to any political arrangement or combination directed against Japan.

"'"ART. 2. Should the territorial rights or the special interests in the Far East of one of the contracting parties recognized by the other contracting party be threatened, Japan and Russia will take counsel of each other as to the measures to be taken in view of the support or the help to be given in order to safeguard and defend these rights and interests."'

" THE SECRET RUSSO-JAPANESE TREATY.

"The above treaty, as already stated, was a public one. But at the very same time Russia and Japan entered into a secret treaty consisting of six articles. This treaty was first published in the Isvestia, and a translation appeared in the Manchester Guardian on February 1, 1918.

"This treaty was signed on July 3, 1916. It runs as follows:

"'The Russian Government and the Japanese Imperial Government have, with a view to the greater consolidation of their close friendship, established between them by the secret agreements of July 30, 1907, July 4, 1910, and July 8, 1912, agreed to supplement the above-mentioned secret agreements by the following articles:

"'"ARTICLE V. The two high contracting parties acknowledge that the vital interests of both require the safeguarding of China against the political domination by any third power entertaining hostile designs against Russia or Japan, and therefore mutually pledge themselves each time when circumstances demand it, to enter into frank relations based on complete mutual trust with one another with a view to taking joint measures for the prevention of the possibility of the advent of such a state of affairs (in China).

"'"ART. 2. If as a result of the measures taken by mutual agreement by Russia and Japan, in virtue of the preceding article, war should be declared by the third power referred to in article 1 of the present convention on either of the contracting parties, the other party shall on the first demand of its ally come to its assistance, and each of the high contracting parties pledges itself hereby, in case such a situation should arise, not to conclude peace with the common enemy without the previous consent of its ally.

"'"ART. 3. The terms on which each high contracting party is to render armed assistance to the other in accordance with the preceding article, as well as the form in which this assistance is to be rendered, shall be determined jointly by the respective competent authorities of the two contracting parties.

"'"ART. 4. Provided that neither high contracting party shall regard itself bound by article 2 of the present convention in respect of rendering armed assistance to its ally so long as it has not been given guaranties by its allies that they, too, will render such assistance to it as would correspond to the seriousness of the impending conflict.

"'"ART. 5. The present convention enters into force from the moment of its signature, and shall remain in force until July, 1921. Should one of the high contracting parties not deem it necessary, 12 months before the expiry of this term to give notice of its unwillingness to prolong the validity of the present convention, the latter shall remain in force for a period of one year after it has been denounced by one or other of the high contracting parties.

"'"ART. 6. The present convention shall be kept in complete secrecy from everybody except the two high contracting parties."

"'In witness whereof the undersigned have confirmed the present instrument by hand and seal at Petrograd, June 20 (July 3), 1916, corresponding to the Japanese (date of Thursday) seventh month and fifth year in the reign of Taise.

Badger & Sons Co.; of the Potter Confectionery Co.; of the Whitin Machine Works, of Whitinsville; of Monks & Johnson; of the Worcester Bleach & Dye Works Co.; of the Victor Electric Corporation; of the Hallet & Davis Piano Co.; of the National Equipment Co., of Springfield; of the Chapel Mills Manufacturing Co., of Cherry Falls; of the Clemence Associates; of the G. W. J. Murphy Co., of Amesbury; of the Nonotuck Silk Co., of Florence; of the Bourn Hadley Co., of Templeton; of Harry Pitts; of the Haverhill Box Board Co.; of the New England Maple Syrup Co.; of the Blake Pump & Condenser Co., of Fitchburg; of the Bishop Co., of North Attleboro; of P. J. Nangle & Co., of Boston; of the Irving & Casson-A. H. Davenport Co.; of the Fitchburg Foundry Co.; of the F. C. Phillips Co., of Stoughton; of the East Weymouth Wool Scouring Co.; of H. R. Holden & Co.; of the Coates Clipper Manufacturing Co., of Worcester; of the Stockbridge Machine Co.; of the F. H. Sadler Co., of Attleboro; and of the Crandall Engineering Co., of East Boston, all in the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the repeal of the so-called daylight-saving law, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. FERNALD presented petitions of sundry citizens of Guilford, Bath, Portland, Auburn, Bethel, Gardiner, and Belfast, all in the State of Maine, praying for the repeal of the so-called "luxury" tax, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PAGE presented a memorial of the Holy Name Society of St. Peters Parish, Rutland, Vt., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of the Lamoille County Association of Congregational Churches of Vermont, remonstrating against the repeal of war-time prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KEYES presented petitions of sundry citizens of Hanover, Salisbury, Wentworth, Henniker, Strafford, Chichester, New Durham, Madbury, Hollis, Milan, Deerfield, and Jackson, all in the State of New Hampshire, praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of Bellevue Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Santa Rosa, Calif., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of the Motorboat Club, of Winona, Minn., praying for a revision of the tax on motor boats, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Minnesota, praying for Government ownership and control of railroads, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FERNALD, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 72) authorizing the erection on public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of a memorial to employees of the United States Department of Agriculture who died in the war with Germany, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CAPPER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2445) to permit the reenlistment of Omer G. Paquet in the United States Army, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 107) thereon.

Mr. McLEAN, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the bill (S. 2472) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 108) thereon.

APPROPRIATIONS MADE AVAILABLE.

Mr. WARREN. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 147) to ratify and confirm, from and including July 1, 1919, obligations incurred pursuant to the terms of certain appropriations for the fiscal year 1920. As it contains only about half a dozen lines and is important, I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That appropriations for the service of the fiscal year 1920, contained in the Agricultural, Army, District of Columbia, Navy, and sundry civil appropriations acts, and the "third deficiency appropriation act, fiscal year 1919," shall be available from and including July 1, 1919, for the purposes respectively provided in the said appropriations for the service of the said fiscal year. And all obligations incurred pursuant to the terms of such appropriations in the aforesaid acts as approved are ratified and confirmed from and including July 1, 1919.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 2621) providing that officers and enlisted men who have been honorably discharged and who reenlist shall be entitled to count their previous service in computing longevity pay;

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 2635) to authorize the Department of Commerce, by the National Bureau of Standards, to examine and test manufactured articles or products for the owner or manufacturer thereof, to issue a certificate as to the nature and quality of such manufactured articles or products, and to prevent the illegal use of such certificate; to the Committee on Commerce.

PRICES OF CATTLE AND SWINE.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for the immediate consideration of Senate resolution 133, which went over from yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is morning business. It comes over from a preceding day.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S. Res. 133) submitted yesterday by Mr. HARRIS, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission be, and it is hereby, directed to make an immediate investigation of the methods of purchase and prices paid for cattle and swine by persons and corporations engaged in the meat-packing industry, with particular reference to the discriminations, if any, operating to the disadvantage of live-stock producers in the Southern States, and to report as soon as practicable to the Senate the results of such investigation.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, the meat packers combine and discriminate against the hog raisers of the South by paying them 3 cents less per pound for hogs than they pay for the same in other sections of the country. This investigation will, in my judgment, show the great injustice being done and the discrimination against the hog raisers of the South. The Federal Trade Commission has made a thorough investigation of the meat packers, and, in connection with the Department of Agriculture, can make this investigation, so that no injustice may be done the hog raisers in my State and section. I therefore ask for the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I wish to announce that after the conclusion of morning business on next Thursday, July 31, I shall address the Senate on the league of nations.

PRICE OF SUGAR.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have received a great many protests from different parts of the country as to the price sugar is being sold at to-day. I should like to have the people of the United States know that the sugar producers are still working under the agreement made by Mr. Hoover as head of the Food Administration. They are getting no more for their sugar sold to the wholesalers of the country than they have been receiving since that agreement was first made.

I want the people to understand that that agreement remains in force until after the sugar crop of 1919 is marketed. So wherever exorbitant prices are being paid for sugar it is not because the producer of sugar is charging more than was agreed to a year ago.

I wished to make this statement because of the fact that I have understood there are jobbers in this country making over a dollar a bag upon sugar to-day, based upon the scarcity of sugar. In this connection I wish to say that there have been exportations of sugar of late, and that was taken as an excuse for raising the price of sugar to the consumer. Exportations of sugar have ceased, I am informed by the Food Administration. The American people should not be compelled to pay one penny more for sugar than they have paid during the last year.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. May I ask the Senator a question? Did we not, in connection with Great Britain, buy a vast quantity of sugar in Cuba?

Mr. SMOOT. We did.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is our part of it coming into the United States?

Mr. SMOOT. It is coming in as required. I will say to the Senator from Georgia that about two months ago there was at that particular time what appeared to be a shortage in the sugar in the United States, but that was brought about more through fear than by anything else, and it was based upon the fact that we were exporting sugar.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Just before he left for abroad I discussed the subject with Mr. Hoover, and the real problem then seemed to be whether we could dispose of our entire purchase without a loss.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator there is no fear on that account. Some of the sugar sections of Western States are not going to produce more than half a crop this year, and I feel quite certain there is going to be a world shortage of sugar.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator permit me to make an inquiry before he resumes his seat? I understand the Government now controls the sugar crop?

Mr. SMOOT. It does.

Mr. SHERMAN. It has the entire output?

Mr. SMOOT. It has, as to the sale.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am unable, or anyone in Washington, to purchase more than 2 pounds at a time. I understand that restriction applies over a very large area. Will the Senator explain how a thrifty housewife will do her canning this summer under a Government regulation of that kind?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that that restriction, I understand, is now being removed. The Senator was correct in the statement as applying to two weeks ago, but I understand that since then the restriction has been removed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I want to state that yesterday it was in force on the senior Senator from Illinois. He tried to buy it, and was limited to 2 pounds.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is correct as to two weeks ago, but I understand that that situation has been relieved.

Mr. SHERMAN. Grocers in Washington are still enforcing it. They seem not to have followed that direction.

Mr. THOMAS. That is not a Government limitation. It is a limitation imposed by retail dealers in different parts of the country, the reason assigned being that their orders to wholesalers at present are not promptly filled. Whether there is any basis for the reason, I do not know.

PEACE TREATY AND LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the early approval by the United States Senate of the ratification of the peace treaty embracing the league of nations depends, in my opinion, upon the effect that reservations or interpretative clauses, in the resolution which may be adopted by the Senate, will have upon the ultimate approval and adoption of the treaty by the other nations that are parties to the treaty.

If reservations may be made that we have a right to feel certain will be accepted by all of the other nations without involving the reopening of the whole matter of peace negotiations and long and dangerous delays, in my opinion, such reservations will be approved by two-thirds of the Senate.

If, on the other hand, as I now believe, the adoption of any reservation by the Senate will reopen every question involved in the peace negotiation, invite other nations to insist upon amendments and reservations affecting their particular interests, and result in long and dangerous delay if not the entire disruption of the plans for peace, then the treaty will be approved by the Senate as made and submitted to us by the President without reservations, amendments, or other changes.

Before proceeding to a discussion of the law and the facts that lead me to the conclusion that I have reached, permit me to describe, as I see it, the attitude of the various factions or groups in the Senate. They may be divided into four groups: First, those who believe in national isolation and who are opposed to any league of nations; second, those who favor a phantom league of nations without effective powers and who, to accomplish this purpose, would eliminate by amendment or reservations the vital articles of the covenant; third, those who favor the league of nations as it is now planned but who desire that the rights and obligations of the United States under the treaty be made more certain by interpretative reservations in the resolution of approval; fourth, Senators who favor the league of nations and believe that the rights and obligations of our country are definitely stated in the articles of the covenant and who are now ready to vote for the approval of the treaty without amendments, reservations, interpretations, or other qualifications or changes.

There are but a few Senators in the first group. There are but a few more in the second group, and I am confident that those two groups combined do not constitute one-third of the Senators. In the third group there are possibly one-third of the Members of the Senate. The fourth group includes the main body of the Senate, and if a vote were taken to-day I am satisfied that they would cast a majority vote.

The fate of the league of nations does not rest with those Senators who would destroy or emasculate the covenant, but with those other Senators to whom I have referred, who favor the league of nations, but who now have in mind ratification with interpretative reservations. These Senators are not fixed in their determination to vote for reservations. They are studying and weighing the result of a rejection of the treaty as it stands through adoption of reservations. This attitude was clearly expressed by the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] in his able speech delivered in the Senate on July 17, when, in discussing reservations, he said:

"Mr. President, there has been much discussion concerning the league of nations, and the controversy seems to have settled down to the proposition whether the covenant shall be ratified in its present form or with certain reservations. I believe the popular sentiment is universal, and I certainly share it, that the Monroe doctrine should be clearly safeguarded. This is purely an American doctrine, and it differentiates the New World from the Old. I also believe that domestic questions like immigration, which in some of their aspects may be international, should be properly safeguarded. The storm center of these reservations seems to be article 10. As to the retention of this article much may be said on both sides. It may be argued that the United States ought not to bind itself for all time to guarantee the territorial integrity and political independence of the members of the league against external aggression, and yet that argument might not apply with the same force to protecting the territorial settlements made by the peace conference until this new world order is fully established and the present peace of the world made secure. There is a wide distinction between a temporary and a permanent retention of article 10. Upon the question of reservations I reserve my judgment for a full discussion and consideration."

These Senators have nearly all indicated that they would not do anything knowingly that would result in the destruction of the league of nations. They are moved by no such desires. They are urged simply by fear lest some misunderstanding may arise in the future through indefinite language in the body of the treaty. I remember distinctly that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] in his speech before the Senate on the 30th day of June said:

"We must maintain this position of national independence. It is vital not alone from the standpoint of national honor and of national usefulness to the world, but as well from the standpoint of our own commercial, agricultural, and industrial prosperity, and it is for this reason that the American people ought to be assured in advance that in the ratification of the treaty there shall be such reservations as will in no sense require the treaty to be sent back to the other nations of the world and thus delay the final consummation of peace * * *."

The Senator touched the vital question that must be determined by each Senator and that is, Will qualified ratification of the treaty, with reservations or interpretative expressions, send it back for renegotiation, reconsideration, and reconstruction by a peace conference; and if so, then what will be the probable result of such action? The determination of this question first involves the legal effect of placing reservations or interpretative expressions in the resolution of approval adopted by the Senate. If the reservation becomes a part of the treaty, and our Supreme Court has held that it does, then the consent to and the approval of such reservation must be obtained by the same bodies that are required to consent to and approve the treaty, and with the same formality. If it is necessary that the treaty as negotiated be approved by the United States Senate, then it is equally necessary that any amendment or reservation or interpretative clause added thereto by any other Government a party to the treaty must first receive the approval of two-thirds of the United States Senate before the treaty with such reservations or amendments becomes binding upon our Government. This is equally true, even if our Senate had already approved the treaty and such qualifications were placed in it by other nations subsequent to such approval. Although the treaty had once been approved by the Senate, the President would have no authority to accept it or ratify it in the form in which it was subsequently amended by another party to the treaty. Such qualifications or changes or reservations made by other nations would constitute a different treaty from that which the Senate had already approved, and it would be necessary for it to again be submitted to the Senate for its further advice and consent and approval.

Such was the determination of the United States Senate in the matter of the ratification of the treaty between the United States and Spain, wherein Florida was ceded to the United States. This treaty was signed on the 22d day of February, 1819. On the 24th day of February, 1819, the Senate advised and consented to its ratification with this reservation:

"All grants made since the 24th of January, 1819, when the first proposal on the part of his Catholic Majesty for the cession of the Floridas was made, are thereby declared and agreed to be null and void."

The treaty thus amended by reservation was returned to Spain for ratification. On the 21st day of October, 1820, the King of Spain, in his written ratification annexed to the treaty, admitted in explicit terms that it was the positive understanding of the negotiators on both sides, when the treaty was signed, that the grants were thereby annulled, and declared also that they had remained and did remain entirely annulled and invalid. This would appear to be simply a ratification of the treaty as amended by reservations by the United States Senate, but it was made in different language and therefore might be subject to a different construction by the United States. Therefore the President of the United States again submitted the treaty to the Senate for its further advice and consent. And again, on the 19th day of February, 1821, the Senate, for the second time, advised and consented to the ratification of the treaty, including the interpretative expressions of the King of Spain as a part of the treaty. Subsequently this treaty came before the Supreme Court of the United States for judicial construction, particularly with regard to the effect of the reservations. Mr. Chief Justice Taney, in delivering the opinion of the court, after reciting the facts, stated:

"For it is too plain for argument that where one of the parties to a treaty, at the time of its ratification, annexes a written declaration explaining ambiguous language in the instrument or adding a new and distinct stipulation, and the treaty is afterwards ratified by the other party with the declaration attached to it, and the ratifications duly exchanged, the declaration thus annexed is a part of the treaty, and as binding and obligatory as if it were inserted in the body of the instrument. The intention of the parties is to be gathered from the whole instrument as it stood when the ratifications were exchanged."

Permit me to call attention to the fact that the annexes or reservations made by the King of Spain subsequent to the ratification of the treaty by the Senate were only interpretative and did not in any wise change the purpose or effect of the treaty as previously ratified by the United States Senate. Yet the Senate was entitled to determine that question for itself, and therefore it was resubmitted to the Senate and the Senate found it necessary to again approve the treaty.

Is it not clear, from this precedent of the United States Senate and the decision of the Supreme Court, that any annex or reservation or addition or qualification to the written treaty must be submitted to the other parliaments or officers authorized to consent to and approve treaties?

I know that the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Rhode Island and other Senators who would like to see interpretative clauses attached to the treaty have hoped that such action would not require reconsideration and further action by the other parties to the treaty. It must now appear that there is no foundation for such hope. It is immaterial whether the Senate considers the reservation as changing the treaty or not, for that is a question under the law of contracts that the other party has an equal right to determine. It is immaterial whether the change be accomplished in the body of the treaty or by reservations in the resolution approving the treaty or by interpretative clauses annexed to the treaty. The question is, Is the wording of the treaty changed? If it is, the construction to be placed upon such words and their effect upon the terms of the treaty are questions to be determined by all of the parties to the treaty. The treaty is a contract; it is an agreement that requires the meeting of the minds of the contracting parties upon the terms. Agreements may be only expressed in words, and words are subject to various constructions. The words, therefore, in a contract are of as much importance to the contracting parties as the agreement itself, and the words once agreed upon can not be changed without the consent of each of the parties to be bound by the contract.

Is it not, then, clear that the argument of some Senators that further consideration and ratification by the other parties is unnecessary, because the words added to the treaty do not change its meaning, has no support in law?

Mr. Justice Brown, in delivering a concurring opinion in the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of The Diamond Rings (183 U. S., 182), says, in considering the treaty between the United States and Spain:

"In its essence it is a contract. It differs from an ordinary contract only in being an agreement between independent States instead of private parties. (Foster v. Neilson, 2 Pet., 253, 314, 7 L. ed., 415, 435; Head Money Cases, 112 U. S., 580, sub nom; Edye v. Robertson, 28 L. ed., 798, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep., 247.) By the Constitution (Art. II, par. 2) the President 'shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.'

"Obviously the treaty must contain the whole contract between the parties, and the power of the Senate is limited to a ratification of such terms as have already been agreed upon between the President, acting for the United States, and the commissioners of the other contracting power.

"The Senate has no right to ratify the treaty and introduce new terms into it which shall be obligatory upon the other power, although it may refuse its ratification or make such ratification conditional upon the adoption of amendments to the treaty. If, for instance, the treaty with Spain had contained a provision instating the inhabitants of the Philippines as citizens of the United States the Senate might have refused to ratify it until this provision was stricken out. But it could not, in my opinion, ratify the treaty and then adopt a resolution declaring it not to be its intention to admit the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands to the privileges of citizenship of the United States. Such resolution would be inoperative as an amendment to the treaty, since it had not received the assent of the President or the Spanish commissioners."

The learned justice states that any additions to the treaty must be solemnly ratified by the other party. If the Senate of the United States makes additions to the treaty by words of qualification, limitation, or interpretation in the resolution of approval annexed to the treaty, then what solemn ratification will be required of the other parties to the treaty? The Governments of Great Britain, France, and Italy have already decided that the treaty can not be ratified or become of binding effect upon those countries until it receives the approval of their respective parliaments. The House of Commons of Great Britain has already by an almost unanimous vote approved the treaty as negotiated. The treaty is now before the Chamber of Deputies of France and the Chamber of Deputies of Italy. The laws governing the approval and ratification of treaties in those countries are similar to ours. If we add to the treaty or take away from it or change it in any way, the treaty will then again have to be submitted to the Parliaments of Great Britain, France, and Italy for their approval of the treaty in its changed form.

The decisions that I have quoted defining the law of the ratification of treaties is conclusive upon this subject. If the United States Senate under the law governing treaties is compelled to reconsider the treaty with any changes made by the other Governments parties to the treaty, then the other Governments have got to consider and approve changes that we may make in the treaty before it becomes binding upon them. And there are 22 other Governments besides these I have named to which the treaty must again be resubmitted for solemn approval and ratification in accordance with the laws of those countries.

The premier of Great Britain or the premier of France or the premier of Italy has no more authority to accept and ratify a treaty that may be changed by the Senate of the United States than the President of the United States has to approve and ratify changes that may be made in the treaty by the other Governments who are parties to the treaty. Why is this true? Because the power of approval in each of such countries is vested in its parliament, as it is vested in the Senate in this country.

As Mr. John W. Foster says in his work entitled "The Practice of Diplomacy"—

"The signing of treaties or the exchange of ratifications is sometimes accompanied by protocols signed by the representatives of the two contracting parties, or by declarations on the part of one of the representatives, designed to interpret or affect in some way the terms of the treaties. It is a well-settled principle of the Government of the United States that no such document can have any effect whatever upon a treaty to which it is a party unless the document has been submitted to the Senate and received its approval in the same manner as is required for the treaty itself.

"The citation of a few cases will illustrate this practice. When the treaty of 1824 between the United States and Russia was about to be exchanged, the Russian minister informed Secretary Adams that he was instructed by his Government to file an explanatory note at the time of the exchange of ratification stating the views of his Government as to the meaning and effect of certain articles of the treaty. Secretary Adams informed him that such a note could have no effect whatever upon the treaty unless it was sent to the Senate with the treaty and received its approval, intimating that such a course might imperil the treaty. He advised the minister not to make it a part of his act of exchange of ratifications, but to file it at some date after that event. It would then be received as the interpretation placed upon the treaty by his Government. The minister pursued this course."

I particularly call attention to the last two sentences of the quotation. Secretary Adams advised the Russian minister to file as a separate instrument, and after the ratification of the treaty, any interpretations that his Government might place upon the terms of the treaty. His reason for this is plain, as has been determined by the precedents and decisions that I have heretofore cited. Any resolution of ratification and approval or other writing annexed to or filed as a part of the treaty changing, modifying, or interpreting the treaty in any manner becomes a part of the treaty and must again go through the formality of approval and ratification. The Russian minister took the advice of Secretary Adams. He subsequently filed a statement of the construction and interpretation placed upon the treaty by his Government. This did not become a part of the treaty and therefore did not compel further action upon the treaty, but it gave notice to the United States of the position that Russia would take if the construction of the treaty were ever brought in question. This, as I understand it, is what is sought by some of the Senators who are classified as being in favor of reservations of interpretation.

And again, on page 292, in describing the ratification required by other Governments, he says:

"The agents must not only be authorized to negotiate, but, as we have seen, the treaty must be duly ratified in the form required in each country."

I have already called attention to the fact that this treaty must be ratified by Great Britain, France, and Italy and be approved by their respective parliaments.

I take it from the foregoing precedents, decisions, and opinions that the necessity for the approval by the Parliaments of Great Britain, France, and Italy of any alterations or interpretations annexed to the treaty by the United States Senate is conclusively determined.

It must also follow that each of these parliamentary bodies, and the proper authority of each of the other parties to the treaty, may not only approve or reject our reservations but each may include in its resolution of approval further expressions of interpretation, qualification, or limitation, both as to our own reservations and to other matters in the treaty that may affect its individual interest. If any such reservations are annexed by these parliaments or Governments to the treaty, then under the decision of the Supreme Court and the precedent which I have cited the treaty in its changed form must again be resubmitted to the Senate of the United States for its further advice and consent with regard to approval. So without end changes may be made by these parliamentary bodies, and without end they must be returned to the other parliamentary bodies for their consideration, consent, or approval.

Are we justified in assuming that these other parliaments and Governments will accept without further interpretation our definitions of the articles of the covenant as affecting our own obligations? Is it not natural to suppose that, after the results of the long and tedious labors of the peace conference and the painful efforts at compromise have been once set aside by the United States Government, other Governments will not hesitate to attempt to obtain in the negotiations privileges and protections that they sought during the negotiations and which they failed to obtain? Such a supposition, Mr. President, is not founded upon experience and common knowledge of international diplomacy.

Japan's most bitter fight at the council table was to grant the league jurisdiction to prevent the United States, Canada, and Australia from excluding Japanese from their territories under the immigration laws. Her people are smarting under the alleged stigma. It is the most sensitive question in the Japanese Empire. Think you that the Japanese Government will neglect the opportunity to again insist upon reservations in the treaty covering this point if negotiations are ever again opened?

Think you that the Italian Parliament, having the opportunity by reopening of negotiations, would hesitate to place in the treaty reservations which they believe are necessary to protect her interests at Fiume, Dalmatia, and along the Adriatic when we had set the example?

The Chamber of Deputies of France has demanded of Clemenceau the evidence and the argument upon which he based his justification for signing the treaty without provisions for a standing army under the league to protect the borders of France.

Would there be cause for surprise if, in the circumstances, the Parliament of Great Britain should feel justified in adding a reservation to the treaty when it goes back to them to the effect that the clause providing for limitation of naval armament shall not, by reason of Great Britain's peculiar situation, apply to that Government?

Any reservation by any of these Governments, of this kind or of any other character, will necessitate a return of the treaty for the approval of our Senate and every other parliament or agency invested with the power of approval. There are reservations that I have suggested, and probably many more which I have not mentioned, that our Government would not approve.

And what is the result if there be a failure of approval of our reservations or of the reservations of other nations tacked onto and made a part of the treaty? There is but one alternative—abandonment of efforts for future peace, or long, uncertain, and dangerous renegotiations between all the parties to the treaty.

Mr. President, unless we approve this treaty as it stands, as Great Britain has done, then we open the door to all of the disastrous possibilities of renewed international dissension.

Mr. President, I hesitate to criticize the advice of so distinguished a statesman as Mr. Elihu Root, but his recent expressions are, in my opinion, subject to misconstruction, and the question is of too vital importance to permit his statement to go unanswered. In his letter addressed to Senator LODGE, under date of June 19, and which was published as Senate Document No. 41, in discussing the reservation, he present this argument:

"This reservation and these expressions of understanding are in accordance with long-established precedent in the making of treaties. When included in the instrument of ratification they will not require a reopening of negotiation, but if none of the other signatories expressly objects to the ratification with such limitations the treaty stands as limited as between the United States and the other powers.

"If any doubt were entertained as to the effect of such action, the doubt could be readily dispelled by calling upon the four other principal powers represented in the council to state whether they do in fact object to the entrance of the United States into the league with the understandings and reservations stated in the resolution."

It is true that the practice of adopting reservations is in accordance with the precedents in making treaties, and I have attempted to show, both by citing precedents and decisions, the effects of such reservations. He first states that such reservations "will not require a reopening of negotiations," yet in the very same sentence he admits that the other parties to the treaty may reject the treaty with the reservations by expressly objecting. Does not this power of rejection necessarily imply a resubmission to and reconsideration by the other parties to the treaty of such changes or additions? Are the other parties to the treaty limited to expressly objecting to the reservations or accepting them? Have they not the same power that our Government has to offer further reservations or clauses of interpretation relating to our particular reservations or to other matters in the treaty that they may consider affect their individual interest? I do not take it that any statesman will question this power. And is it not inevitable, in a peculiar condition such as involves this treaty, where 27 nations, in addition to our enemy, of different races, speaking different languages, with different interests, are involved, that the inevitable result must be a reopening of the whole matter?

In view of the precedents and decisions of our Supreme Court that I have cited, I respectfully insist that Mr. Root's statement that the contract would become binding with our reservations unless the other nations expressly object is not founded in law. If the other Governments fail to approve the treaty with our reservations, in accordance with the laws of their own countries, then the contract is of no binding force or effect. If the ex-Senator sees fit to interpret such action as an "express objection," then he may satisfy himself with regard to his position. But the distinguished statesman admits doubts with regard to the soundness of his own proposition. From one so learned and experienced in such matters, his statement might be taken as advice to the President to call "upon the four other principal powers represented in the council to state whether they do in fact object to the entrance of the United States into the league with the understanding and reservations stated in the resolution."

Why should the President call to the attention of the four other principal powers such changes and not call them to the attention of all of the other 22 powers who assisted in making the treaty and who were parties thereto? Would not the consent of the other powers to such changes have to be obtained before the treaty would be binding upon them? Would Mr. Root be satisfied with the elimination of all of the other powers from the treaty and have only a treaty between the United States and these four powers? What would be the result upon the league of nations if the new treaty as proposed by the Senate were only ratified by the United States and the four other principal nations? Is it not evident that we would then have only an alliance of a group of nations and not a league of all nations? I do not know what Mr. Root may conceive to be the duty of the President of the United States in the premises, but I am satisfied that the President will deem it his duty to call the attention of each and all of the nations who are parties to the treaty to any changes that may be made in the treaty by the Senate, and to request of them that the treaty so changed be approved and ratified according to the laws of their respective countries.

The United States by the ratification of the treaty is assuming serious obligations. It is assuming them upon the theory that all of the other nations who are parties to the treaty are going to assume the same far-reaching obligations. Would the President be doing his duty if he trusted to an equivocal, long-delayed, or implied ratification of the treaty by the other parties to it, with the knowledge of the unfortunate consequences that usually follow such delays and uncertainties?

Again, Mr. Root assumes that it would be an easy matter for the four other principal powers to answer the question as to whether their Governments would consent to such changes in the treaty. The only authority that can answer that question is the authority in whom is vested the power of consenting to and approving such changes. This power is vested in the Parliaments of Great Britain, France, and Italy. How can the President ascertain what action parliaments would take with regard to any proposed reservations by the United States Senate? Who in those Governments or in those parliaments has the knowledge or the authority to answer such a question? If the President of France, the King of England, or the King of Italy should desire to know whether the United States Government would agree to certain proposed reservations on behalf of each one of these respective countries, how would such sovereigns obtain the information from the United States Government? The only power in the United States that can answer such question is the power that has the right of approval or rejection, and that is the United States Senate. Who has the knowledge or authority to answer such questions on behalf of the United States Senate?

The New York Times of July 21 says that Senator LODGE is said to have had word from a prominent British statesman that both Great Britain and France would agree to reservations proposed pertaining to article 10, guaranteeing territorial integrity, the Monroe doctrine, purely domestic questions such as immigration, the tariff, and racial equality, and American right to withdraw from the league upon two years' notice, America to determine for herself if her obligations to the league had been fulfilled.

From whom could Senator LODGE obtain any authoritative information in Great Britain or France? There is only one power in Great Britain that may answer that question, and that is the British Parliament. There is but one power in France that may answer that question, and that is the French Parliament. And neither of these bodies can answer the question except by a vote.

Mr. President, all such assertions might be considered as idle declarations were it not for the unfortunate effect such statements may have upon the ultimate fate of the treaty and the league of nations.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I desire to inquire if the Senator can inform us whether the Senator from Massachusetts has made any public statement with reference to the interview which the Times attributes to him?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I have not seen it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Did the interview give the name of the eminent statesman who was able to inform the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. PITTMAN. The article to which I have referred did not give the name of any statesman.

Mr. President, no Senator who believes that the peace of the world may only be maintained by the concerted action of nations dare endanger the ratification of the treaty of peace by attaching thereto amendments, reservations, or interpretations, unless he has determined that the interest of his country requires that he vote against the treaty unless such reservations be adopted. No mere doubt as to the construction of an article affecting the United States could justify him holding such beliefs in again throwing the world into chaos.

The nations of the world may all be against us, and in the league of nations they may violently misconstrue the articles affecting our interest. They can accomplish the same purpose if there is no league of nations. They are more apt to attempt to accomplish this purpose if there is no league of nations. If we can not trust the nations of the world to do justice to us in the league of nations, we certainly can not trust them outside of the league of nations.

We can wait for peace; Europe can not. A month or a year might not be noticeable here, but two months may mean the destruction of civilization in Europe. Their able-bodied men have been annihilated; their widows and orphans are starving; their lands have been devastated; their factories have been destroyed; their commerce has ceased to exist, and they have no credit. Nothing thrives in Europe to-day except Bolshevism. It is growing like a rank and poisonous weed. Unless we, by bringing about an early peace, assist in cutting it down and stamping it into the ground its seeds will scatter over the world.

The real peace treaty was not with our enemy, but between us and our friends. There is no precedent for such a treaty. We may force any treaty upon a defeated enemy; we must compromise a treaty between our friends. The ablest and most patriotic statesmen of the world, for months, untiringly gave their lives to reaching this compromise treaty. They all agree that it is the best that can ever be obtained.

If you are against the league of nations, then say so and vote against it; kill it openly and quickly, but do not give it a slow poison that must result in its death. The Governments of Europe must act. They must bring peace and order out of chaos and anarchy or those governments will be swept away. The statesmen of Europe have had an almost superhuman task in meeting the wants and allaying the patience of their people. They are holding them together, waiting for our Government to act, while our Senators slowly debate technical questions and future vague possibilities.

Speaking purely as an American, I believe that our Nation will be in as much danger as any other country in the world if this treaty fails. Already there are signs in Europe of the abandonment of peaceful intentions, and groups of nations are feeling their way to organization for war and conquest. If the world does not soon guarantee France and Italy and the new nations against aggression through concerted action under the league of nations, then an alliance, an offensive and defensive alliance under the old order of things, is inevitable. We know what that alliance will be and we know that we will not be a member of it. We know that there will be an alliance of powers superior to our strength that will not be in sympathy with our policies and our interests. Our Monroe doctrine will then cease to be a doctrine, because we will be unable to maintain it. We will be able to defend our own shores, but only by establishing and maintaining the greatest navy and the most powerful army that any country ever had. Let us not deceive ourselves nor the people of the country. Let us tell them the truth. Let us tell them that if this league of nations fails, that then they will be called upon and will have to support their Government in a militarism that will be the only safety of our country.

Mr. President, I pray God that the world may awake from this nightmare of horror.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona obtained the floor.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Nevada a question.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senate, I am sure, is grateful to the Senator from Nevada for his very valuable contribution to this discussion, but I should like to give the point to one feature of his very able address.

In referring to the interview with former Senator Root, he is quoted as having said, in effect, that some of the governments might accept interpretations or reservations imposed by us without sufficient action. That, of course, means that a contracting party may amend a contract either expressly or by implication. I assume that former Senator Root referred to governments where it was possible that they could accept a reservation or an interpretation by implication simply by acting upon it as thus interpreted. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada if there is any power in Germany which can accept an interpretation or reservation by implication, and whether it would be necessary, under the present government in Germany, that the treaty should be resubmitted to the Parliament of Germany and the present existing government?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not think there is any doubt about it. I do not think there would be any question but that under the laws now governing Germany the changed treaty by the additions suggested would necessarily have to go back to the parliamentary body of Germany for ratification and approval.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then, would not Germany be given the perfect right to contend that the treaty which it had ratified has not been ratified by all the powers, and that she is not bound by this treaty until the treaty, in the terms originally submitted to Germany, was ratified by each power intending to be a party signatory to it, and would it not give Germany an opportunity to open up the entire controversy and insist upon such qualifications or interpretations as she might see fit to impose upon it?

Mr. PITTMAN. I think the suggestions of the Senator from New Mexico add to what I have already attempted to make clear, that any changes, no matter how they may be accomplished, made in the treaty by the Senate necessarily must be ratified by the proper legal bodies of all the other countries that are parties to the treaty. There are 27 of them, exclusive of Germany. I think it is clear also that at the same time it goes back to them for their ratification they would not only have the power of ratification or rejection, but they would have the power of further interpretation of what we attempted to interpret and a further power of adding reservations affecting their own interests. In other words, I feel that we should thoroughly understand the situation, and that long delay is inevitable if we add a single amendment or a single reservation or interpretative clause to the treaty.

As to whether a Senator may consider that that delay is justified by the necessity of his amendment or reservation is something that must appeal to his own conscience, and no one else may answer. Long delay might not be as important in the mind of a Senator as the reservation he has in mind.

That is the only question as I take it. I would have no objection to interpretative clauses. I should like to see some interpretative clauses. Like nearly every other Senator, I never saw an instrument drawn by anyone else that I did not feel I could improve upon. I am not governed in my action, however, solely by such sentiments. My action will be dominated by what I consider will bring about an early peace and preserve the league of nations.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not wish to interrupt the Senator from Arizona, and will not take more than a moment. As I understand the position of the able Senator from Nevada, it is that no interpretation or amendment which does not go back for action upon the part of the other nations can be of any real effect.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; of any legal effect.

Mr. BORAH. I thoroughly agree with the Senator. I have no doubt that view is correct, and I hope the entire Senate will take that view. The idea of the United States putting in an interpretation and Brazil putting in an interpretation which may be in conflict with it, and another nation putting in an interpretation, and assuming that those interpretations are going to have any effect ultimately unless accepted, is perfectly absurd to my mind. I agree entirely with the Senator from Nevada that any interpretation or amendment, or any construction or reservation, must go back and be accepted by those nations before it is worth the paper it is written on.

Mr. PITTMAN. I take it, of course, the Senator agrees with me that when it does go back to be accepted by them it carries with it that meaning, that if accepted by the parliaments or agents of those countries that are authorized to consent to and approve treaties.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator from Arizona permit me to ask the Senator from Nevada a question?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. This is the question I wish to ask the Senator from Nevada: The Senator from Idaho says that these reservations have no legal effect. Undoubtedly the Senator is correct in that respect, but if we should make a reservation interpreting our understanding of the treaty or any of its provisions, and Congress should be called upon hereafter to perform any obligation arising out of the treaty with respect to the section to which the reservation is made, would not that reservation of our understanding of its meaning protect this Government against the charge of bad faith if we refused to carry it out with reference to the understanding of other members of the league, but agreed to carry it out with reference to our own understanding as enunciated in the reservation, and would it not be very valuable for that purpose and to that end, although the reservation should have no legal effect?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, there are two characters of resolutions bearing on the subject. One of them is a resolution made a part of the treaty and the other is a resolution made immediately subsequent to the treaty, either one of which may express the interpretation of our Government. If the expressed interpretation is made a part of the treaty, it requires ratification by the other powers which are parties to the treaty, because it becomes a part of the treaty. If the resolution is made subsequently and apart from the ratification of the treaty, it does not become a part of the treaty and does not bind the other Governments in the construction of the treaty, but it does serve the purposes which the Senator from North Carolina stated, of giving to the other parties notice of the position that our Government will take if the construction is ever brought into question.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, Mr. President; and if the reservation is made in such a form that it is legal and binding by the ratification or agreement of other nations, then, of course, it would become a legal obligation.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. But the Senator from Idaho was talking about the other character of reservation, a reservation that did not at any stage assume the form of a legal obligation, and he said that that would be of no value.

Mr. PITTMAN. No; I did not so understand it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did.

Mr. PITTMAN. What he meant was that any reservation, as I understood the Senator; and I understood him to take the position I did, that any reservation or annex of any kind, no matter what you may call it, or any change made in the treaty by the Senate is of no binding effect upon the other parties to the obligation until such change is approved by them according to the laws of their country.

Mr. BORAH. That is the position which I took.

Mr. SIMMONS. I misunderstood the position of the Senator from Idaho.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. CURTIS. Will the Senator from Arizona yield further, that I may make a motion?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, our representatives at the peace conference, together with the representatives of 30 other powers, have unanimously recommended this covenant for a league of nations establishing a democratic organization world-wide in scope, for the humane and righteous purpose of preventing further wars upon the earth. The sincere effort by this great aggregation of the nations to accomplish the purpose is worth more to the world, far more, than the money expended, and if success follows, as it will, this last horrible, brutal, and devastating war will prove in time to have been the greatest blessing ever vouchsafed the nations and peoples of the earth. Its horrors awoke the world to the adoption of measures preventing its recurrence. The means to this end finds expression in the league of nations now before us for ratification or rejection. It is as near perfect as the best and sincerest minds of 30 nations could make it, involving as it does so many intricate and portentous interests. It has been criticized in sincerity by some, and assailed and grossly misrepresented by others—sometimes I fear under press of political prejudice. These critics are professedly, devotedly, in favor of a league, but not this one. Not one of them has presented even the skeleton of the league that would suit him, and save the world. A league of nations for the future peace of the world was one of the famous 14 points set forth by the President in his message to Congress, on which a just and an abiding peace must be made. Not one word of objection or dissent was heard then. Why this uproar and clamor now? Oh, you answer, "It is not the kind of a league we wanted." What kind do you want? It is high time to give us a sample of your superior wisdom by presenting a model. Your good faith is at stake. It is easy to tear down what you could not build. The matchless temple of Diana was destroyed by a reckless dupe who hoped that his name might live in history. Is one-third of the Senate of the United States to emulate that achievement by destroying this temple of peace, this league of nations, built by the hands of the chosen architects of 30 nations of the earth, and around which cluster the dreams of the philosopher, the love of the Christians, the hope of a war-ridden and devastated world? Its foundation is laid in the blood of millions on millions of men who fought that civilization might be saved, and that the angel mission, peace on earth, good will among men, might be fully accomplished. No, you will not destroy this dream, this love, this hope of the bleeding world, unless you shall shut your mind from the light of reason and your ears against the suffering cry of humanity. Why should anyone wish to defeat this treaty? Why this hypercritical interpretation of its terms? Why this effort of some Members to make this a party issue? May God have mercy on the man who would willingly place party success above the peace and prosperity of his country. May God pity the narrow, contracted soul and the timid heart of him who would counsel or consent to his country's evasion of the responsibility and duty that modern times and modern events have thrown upon it. We are no longer a hermit Nation, nor can we play the part of a hermit in the fast unfolding duties and obligations resting on the civilization of this hour. We are the most powerful and peace-loving Nation on the earth. We have no cause to fear any. Our position in the affairs of this world demonstrates the fact that no war of any magnitude can be waged without bringing us into its awful vortex. The last one fully reveals that inevitable consequence. The league of nations alone can prevent such a catastrophe in the future. Is it worth trying? The death-dealing discoveries and inventions called forth by the last war make the next one absolutely destructive. Better that some sacrifices, some expenditure of millions for the preservation of peace, than that untold billions should be used again in gaining an empty victory.

Our last war was fought to little purpose, our billions of treasure spent in vain, the blood of our heroic boys offered as a useless sacrifice, if out of it all no provision is made at this epochal time to prevent a recurrence of these woes by establishing a guaranty of all civilized nations against any aggression of one against another.

It seems pitiable to me that men can be found willing by any pretense or under any conviction or for any purpose to throw away this first real chance of the world to better the conditions in it. We are an essential and very important part of the world from now until the end of all human government. This great globe on which all the nations, tribes, and people must live is not larger than a football as compared with a century ago. Whether we will or not, our interest, our trade, our industries, touch every port and every transportation line on earth, and every consideration of all these demand that peace, not war, shall be the normal condition of mankind. Our premier position makes the peace of the world more important to us than to any other people. We have it in our hands now to accomplish this, backed as we are by the common consent and eager acquiescence of all the decent peace-loving nations of the earth. Under the proposed league, ours with them and theirs with us, is a purely contractual relation. All are dealing in good faith, and all intend to keep the contract. We bear no burden not common to all. None can afford to break its contract with us, and we have no intention to violate ours with them. Then why this new-born fear of the league?

Mr. President, these general observations having been submitted, let us see, if we can, what this league of nations proposes, and wherein lies the danger to the United States that its critics affirm. One thing is certain—the league is not a world state or supersovereign as so loudly declared by its opponents on this floor. As I said in starting, the obligations assumed are contractual only, and certain machinery is provided for the fulfillment of these mutual obligations.

First, an assembly in which all States members of the league are to have one vote.

Second, a council of nine members, on which the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan are always to be represented, and four other States—Belgium, Brazil, Greece, and Spain—shall be represented on the council.

Third, a secretariat, head of which shall be appointed by the council and ratified by the assembly, and all assistants appointed by him shall be ratified by the council. The States victorious in the late war shall be charter members, together with such States as on invitation shall join. The Central Powers, against whom we fought, are not now to become members of the league for obvious reasons. Eventually all States will become members, because the advantages of membership will constrain them. Admission, however, is allowed only on a two-thirds vote of the assembly. Any State may withdraw on two years' notice if it has fulfilled its obligations under the contract. Mr. Root thought five years was the proper time, but President Wilson had the two-year limit put into the league provisions. This provision alone would save the United States from all the dire evils and fancied wrongs so vociferously asserted in the diaphanous diatribe of desperate debaters on this floor.

The council is to submit plans for a court of international justice for its consideration and adoption. Such a court has been advocated for a half century and more by the leading spirits of every civilized and enlightened country, and various efforts have heretofore been made to accomplish it. A commission on armament is likewise established, which can in no way injure the United States, but vastly redound to its interest. If all disarm in proportion to their local needs and trouble should arise, we have demonstrated to the wondering world our power to surpass all others in hasty preparation for any emergency. We no longer want an army-ridden world. Germany has shown what a menace a fully equipped army is to the peace of unoffending nations. We have now for the first time in history power to limit armament, and that power properly exercised is a sure guaranty of peace.

England and France, unequipped, unready, could not persuade prepared Germany from unbarring the gates of pandemonium and turning loose on the world the crimes and miseries of hell.

Mr. President, the very heart of this covenant is the delay it insures before the first blow is struck. Everyday experience, in even domestic troubles, teaches the necessity of delay and forbearance to prevent hostilities. It is the same with nations as with men. Do you remember the Morocco affair in 1905, where the declared policy of the Kaiser was a prelude of war? A battleship landed off the coast of Agadir. President Roosevelt's influence called the Algeciras conference. This was after the dispute had arisen, when the temper was hot, when both sides were ready to fight. The conference brought delay. The whole differences were discussed. The French claims were established in Morocco. The Kaiser quit and imminent war was thus averted.

You remember the Balkan troubles of 1912, where the peace of the world was preserved by the establishment of the conference of London, at which free discussion was had and the threatened war averted—I should say delayed, for it finally came and has just ended. Who would dare doubt if delay and conference could have been had in the fateful month of July, 1914, that the late war could have been avoided? The civilized world was asking for delay, for conference, for discussion. No machinery existed to obtain either delay or discussion. France protested; England tried to persuade; Russia made ignominious concessions, all to no avail. The Kaiser knew that delay was fatal to the aggressor, and he turned loose the dogs of war.

Under old-time and present conditions war follows the failure of diplomacy in all serious controversies between nations. Under the league, when diplomacy fails, resort to arbitration is had, and that means delay and cooling time and return of reason, which secures peace in ninety-nine cases out of every one hundred. If arbitration is not resorted to, the case goes to inquiry before the council of the league for decision, which equally secures delay and enthrones reason in the place that passion had usurped, and thus equally tends to peace. The covenant of the league sets forth the modus operandi so plainly that no objection has thus far been urged against it on this floor or elsewhere, so far as I have heard.

Mr. President, the human mind is still an enigma; it can not be analyzed or comprehended. It can become so great under inspiring influences, so small under the persuasion of prejudice, fanaticism, selfishness, envy, malice, and even under the hope of political party success, that the normal man, in normal condition, stands filled with amazement and wonder before this inexplicable paradox. What a fruitful study, as far as example is concerned, this phenomenon offers in the present membership of the Senate. When brutal warfare was driving its plowshare through creation, when we entered it with the declaration that its end must be the end of future war, when we declared that a league insuring peace should result, the leaders of the present opposition consented by their silence that such league should be established. Some of those leaders then were earnest advocates of a league, who are now leading the opposition against this league, but offer no substitute for it. Amendments suggested by them to the President on his short return in March, such as the greater protection of the Monroe doctrine and the right to withdraw from obligations, were inserted by the President on his return to France. He met the unnecessary objections raised then, but no sooner had he done that than we began to hear of the unconstitutional provisions of the league—that it took from Congress the power to declare what tariff taxes should be collected, or at least affected seriously the constitutional powers of Congress in that regard; that in certain emergencies it took from Congress its constitutional power to limit and control appropriations on the happenings of certain fancied events which might occur under the covenants contained in the treaty. What wet nurses of the Constitution these great fault-finding leaders have recently become. These declarations of the unconstitutional covenants of the league would be as laughable as they are silly except for the stupendous tragedy involved in the defeat, under false pretense, of the beneficent hopes held out to us and the eager expectant world in its guaranties and mutual, sincere, and unselfish promises to make the world a better home for all the sons and daughters of men.

The great mass of genuine patriotic American citizens revere the Constitution as the palladium of their liberties, as well as the source of our marvelous prosperity and power. To the unread and busy of this noble class the disingenuous appeal goes forth to defeat, or amend, or qualify this great document, this covenant of peace, fresh from the hands, as I have said, of the biggest, broadest, and best men that could be chosen from the leading nations of the earth, because they say it violates the Constitution. Would to God that everyone to whom this prejudicial, yet groundless, appeal is made could be furnished with the illuminating and unanswerable speech of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], in which he demonstrates beyond the doubt of an honest lawyer that nowhere does this treaty affect the Constitution further than the great majority of our treaties have affected it, and as this treaty in the same degree will affect it to the end of time. The Constitution makes a duly ratified treaty the supreme law of the land. The Constitution makes laws passed in pursuance of the instrument likewise the supreme law of the land. An act of Congress can nullify a treaty. A treaty can repeal an existing law. This was held by the Supreme Court directly in Whitney against Robinson, 124 Supreme Court Reports, and in too many other cases has it been so held to admit controversy now.

Why all this clamor about a treaty amending our organic law? Why all this vociferous exaggeration about this covenant changing our form of government? Why this desperate delusion of a supersovereignty being erected on the ruin of our revered Constitution? A super-State, a supreme sovereignty! What is meant by such declamatory catchwords? Do Senators think they are fooling anybody by constant reiteration of them? A super-State, indeed! Without a citizen or subject, with no local habitation or a name, no geography, no army or navy, no treasury, no power to declare war or levy taxes. And yet such is the scarecrow of a super-State that political prejudice or personal hate is holding up to the frightened gaze of those who are ofttimes willing victims of this miserable cheap political camouflage.

Mr. President, guaranteeing other nations against external invasion is no new experience with us. The Monroe doctrine, to the preservation of which such useless and fervid appeal has been made of late, is itself a striking example. I say useless appeal for the reason that the Monroe doctrine is not now, and never has been, in jeopardy by reason of any provision in the covenant. Is the Monroe doctrine violative of the constitutional power of Congress to declare war? It simply warns the world that Congress will declare war if the doctrine is questioned by assault of any transoceanic nation. The Monroe doctrine would be a silly threat if the world doubted that Congress would, when occasion arose, raise armies and pay bills in its maintenance and support. The world knows Congress has said so. Congress always has and always will keep faith with the treaties we make, but the whole diplomatic world knows that Congress has the power to refuse supplies whenever it shall so determine, and every treaty made with us is executed in the light of this knowledge.

The House of Representatives did refuse in the Jay treaty to make the necessary appropriation to carry out its terms, but subsequently revoked this action and the treaty survived. But let it be known that political influence was at work then, as it is now, in opposition to the treaty, and it failed then as it will fail now in carrying out its unreasonable and unholy purpose to defeat the covenant now under consideration.

The same question arose in the Louisiana Purchase, on the question of paying the stipulated price of $15,000,000, with the same result in the House. It is true that the then political parties reversed face on their former positions between the treaty of 1796 and the treaty of 1803. The plain, outstanding fact remains now as it existed then, to wit, no treaty can declare war, raise taxes, intrude on the constitutional prerogatives of Congress, or hinder in any way—except by moral restraint—the full exercise of its secured functions. It is of no consequence that the treaty deals with a subject on which Congress has power to legislate. As shown by the Senator from Montana in his great speech, to which I have made former reference, that the theory that the treaty-making power does not extend to any subject with reference to which power is invested in Congress has been long ago exploded, if, in fact, it was ever seriously maintained, and he cites so many striking examples, interwoven with argument so lucid and convincing, that no repetition of the history is necessary.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to ask permission of the Senator from Arizona to interrupt him to remind him of a matter that is in keeping with the argument he has just made. The Republicans have seriously contended, or serio-comically contended, rather, that this country had no right to agree to guarantee the territorial integrity or the independence of any other part of the world, because that action could not bind future Congresses, and they have contended that it was unconstitutional to agree beforehand to defend the possessions of other countries. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Arizona to the fact, which he well remembers, that the first treaty ever entered into by this country, made under the Continental Congress and afterwards confirmed under the Constitution, was a solemn promise upon the part of the United States to defend France in her West Indies possessions. That treaty, it is true, was afterwards violated, or breached, rather, under the administration of George Washington, but the treaty was solemnly made under the Continental Congress, solemnly confirmed under the Constitution, and recognized by the United States. By it we undertook to preserve and defend France in her sovereignty and possession of the West Indies Islands. When the time came under George Washington everybody admitted that if we had to go to war to do it, Congress would have to declare war; but, as neither Congress nor Washington wanted to do that, neither one of them did it.

Mr. BORAH. That shows the beauty of making the treaty.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I thank the Senator from Mississippi for his illuminating interruption.

But for mere hasty example let me briefly recapitulate. The Constitution gives Congress power over foreign commerce, yet we have entered into many commercial treaties affecting that commerce without objection ever being raised. Congress is given power to lay and collect duties, yet by the Louisiana Purchase treaty the ships of France and Spain entering ceded ports should pay no duty on cargoes. The same principle is found in our treaty with Cuba. This is "meddling with the tariff," yet the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who objects to this league on that account, voted without comment for the Cuban treaty. But the tariff is a purely domestic question, and with all other such questions is expressly excluded from league jurisdiction.

Congress has power to raise and support armies and to provide and maintain a navy. Yet we entered into a treaty with Great Britain—and for a hundred years have observed it—limiting the number of armed vessels on the Great Lakes. Congress has power to make laws naturalizing aliens. Yet by treaty with Spain, on the purchase of Florida, the inhabitants of that territory were made citizens of the United States, as was also done by the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo with Mexico, yet no one ever contended that the Constitution of the United States was being interfered with by thus creating citizens of the United States by treaty.

Congress has power to make rules and regulations respecting the property of the United States. The Panama Canal is the property and the zone the territory of the United States. As to how we acquired it it is well to say as little as possible, but a settlement of tolls by treaty was never assailed on the ground of its interference with congressional power. Further investigation, no doubt, would multiply instances showing that a subject is not beyond the treaty-making power only because it lies within some powers granted to Congress by the Constitution.

Further investigation no doubt will multiply these cases enormously, and they will continue to multiply as we negotiate other treaties with the peoples of the world.

So it follows that merely because the treaty involves something that Congress has power to do, it does not necessarily interfere with either the powers of Congress or the treaty-making powers.

Why, then, this persistent assault on article 10 of this covenant and the loud declamation against its constitutionality. We did make alliances with other nations before the Constitution was adopted, and that instrument nowhere modifies that right, but confirms it in the treaty-making power. And if the Constitution had been utterly silent on the question, who dares doubt that alliances could be made, would of necessity have to be made, with other powers under the inherent right of an independent sovereignty? Section 10 of the covenant is the very heart of the league of nations and promises the only forceful safeguard in carrying out the purpose of preserving the world peace by using the common, mutual force of the world, if necessary, to discipline and punish a willfully recalcitrant nation that violates the universal Monroe doctrine established by the agreements and covenants of the league. Our Monroe doctrine is excluded eo nomine from the jurisdiction of the league, but this even does not satisfy microscopical criticism.

The league in terms declares that "regional questions" * * * "like the Monroe doctrine" shall not be subjected to league domination or to question at all.

Mr. President, if the Monroe doctrine had never been promulgated, if it had never been heard of or thought of, it would nevertheless have been fully protected in carrying out the declared guaranties of this treaty. But, be that as it may, there remains still the fact that article 10 of the covenant, neither in terms nor by any reasonable implication, violates or attempts to violate nor could it violate any provision of the Constitution, nor does it take from Congress or attempt to take from it, nor could it take from it, any power or right granted to Congress under the Constitution.

Article 10 of the league is in the following words:

> "The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression, or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression, the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled."

This undoubtedly binds us, in common with all the other 30 signatories of the treaty, to wage war, if necessary, against an obdurate recalcitrant nation violating the peace of the world. But we have not hesitated heretofore, by treaty—and in a much less worthy cause—to assume an obligation of war.

When the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] was Attorney General, under the Roosevelt administration, a treaty was negotiated with Panama, which bound us under certain conditions to go to war with any nation offending the treaty stipulation. He was acting the rôle of a statesman then, and never dreamed that under the treaty-making power he was offending in any way the Constitution of the United States. The first clause of that treaty is in these significant words:

"The United States guarantees and will maintain the independence of the Republic of Panama."

That bond of ours was a direct defiant declaration of war in advance against any and all nations daring to interfere with or destroy the independence of this little, home-made Republic of ours.

Where is Roderick now? This same justly distinguished man, now Senator from Pennsylvania, introduced a resolution in the Senate wherein, among other things, he requests the Senate to affirm, "The Constitution provides the only way it can be amended." * * *—that is absolutely new and illuminating—"the treaty-making power has no authority to make a treaty which in effect amends the Constitution."

It could not if it tried.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The courts would declare it invalid.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It would be invalid if it tried; but he said it had no power to make a treaty which in effect amends the Constitution.

"And the Senate can not consent to any treaty provision which would have such effect if enforced."

Listen—

"If enforced."

If it was not constitutional in the first instance, how in the name of conscience could the fact of enforcement have anything to do with that question?

This plainly referred to the obligation of the covenant that we, with all other signatories to it, would go to war in certain specified contingencies.

In answer I submit his own treaty with Panama, by the terms of which he bound the United States, on certain contingencies, to go to war, which "if enforced" would have been unconstitutional. I can not see how enforcement, as I said before, would make it unconstitutional if it was not already so. It has been called to our attention that the Senator from Pennsylvania nowhere in his resolution nor in his speech before this body in advocacy of it unequivocally committed himself to the view that the treaty-making power is not sufficiently broad to warrant a convention or covenant obligating the Nation to make war presently or upon a future contingency, yet the careless or casual reader would receive from the speech and the resolution the impression that the very distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania had announced that doctrine. I do not think he will proclaim it as his view of the full scope of the treaty-making power. We all know that no treaty or any law can amend or alter any provision of the Constitution. The debates and press reports on the Panama treaty nowhere discloses any criticism of the treaty-making power to bind our country to make war, if need be, for the protection of Panama independence. Members now living and still serving here, and some of whom are vehemently assailing as unconstitutional the possible war provision hidden in article 10 of this covenant, voted without protest for the war covenant in the Panama treaty. The present Senators who thus voted are LODGE, MCCUMBER, NELSON, PENROSE, SMOOT, and WARREN. Not a word of protest came from them. There was a declaration of war, if need be. It was perfectly constitutional then, but there was no political campaign on in connection with the President two years ahead.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It was a promise to make war.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It was a declaration of war in advance, just as the Monroe doctrine has always been.

Again in 1846, when Webster, Benton, and Calhoun were Members of the Senate, the United States made a treaty, as we all know, with New Granada. No constitutional objection was raised then against that treaty, which contained, among many covenants, the following:

"The United States guarantees positively and efficaciously"—

Note the binding and earth-challenging force of the words—

"to New Granada the perfect neutrality of the Isthmus * * * the United States also guarantees in the same manner the rights of sovereignty and property which New Granada has and possesses over the said territory."

That guaranty positively meant war if trespass occurred on the rights of Granada. Time and time again such guaranties have been given by us in treaty stipulations, to be met now for the first time by a challenge of the power thus exercised. In the light of present circumstances this challenge is quite significant. I refrain from any reference to newspaper caution for us to be certain to preserve the Monroe doctrine, save our rights to pass on questions of immigration—"for God's sake do not take from Congress the power to tax imports," and other like rot from the pen of that profound lawyer, that international authority, that expounder of the Constitution, Mr. Hays, who happens just now to be the political chairman of the Republican national political committee, chosen for that place rather for his political sagacity than for his erudition in broader and more important fields of human endeavor. I will pause long enough to express my profound disappointment that this great world crisis and our connection as the leading Nation with it should be degraded to the low level that debates occupy in party political contests. Coming from this side of the Chamber or from that, the man who views this question from the standpoint of party success, who subrogates the question of the peace of our country and the betterment of the world to party success at the polls, betrays a lack of concern in the great responsibility that our position here imposes.

Every criticism of the league made on this floor and elsewhere is based on the postulate that all the burdens imposed under its terms are to be borne by us alone. All imagined injustice lurking in it is to be visited on us alone. One moment's consideration of the mutuality of the covenant—that each must bear his part in what is done and each must refrain from doing prohibited things—would greatly relieve much of the fear expressed for our safety and the preservation of our rights under it. Whatever we have to do, England and France and Italy and Japan and some 30 other nations are also bound to do; and every one who joins the league will likewise become bound mutually to do with us the same things exactly. All being obligated to same results, it follows that there is not one chance in one hundred that much will be required, and not one in a thousand that resort to arms will be necessary. Therein lies both the virtue and force of the whole scheme.

These nations have not joined in a conspiracy to rob or ruin any one of its members. Any nation fulfilling its obligation can withdraw from the league on two years' notice being given. This surely gives every protection to us if, indeed, we shall ever stand in need of it. Each nation acting as it is presumed it will act—in perfect good faith—will itself decide the question whether it has performed its obligations in giving notice of withdrawal. Of course, this interpretation carries with it the possible withdrawal to the point of dissolution, yet if this should occur the world would be in no worse attitude—nor in as bad a condition—as it is to-day.

Looking at the world as it is—the attitude of its nations and tongues, with consequent frictions, of changes in relationship—can you imagine a worse condition? If this treaty is not ratified, what will be the result? I refuse to contemplate the catastrophe further than to mention the future Russ-German alliance, with its possible consequences, destruction of Poland and the Czecho-Slavic State, domination of the Balkan Peninsula, inevitable war between dominated Europe and the United States. We do not know how long it will be. Nothing being done now, it is as inevitable as the last was, without some machinery to settle difficulties in advance. Remember, Germany is not whipped as it should have been. Do not forget the President of that nominal Republic calls himself the President of the German Empire. Keep in mind that the Germany of to-day has not lost its power or purpose of intrigue and alliance beneficial to its commerce and kultur and its force of arms.

Influenced by no fear of all this, but conscious of its possible consequences, is it not the province of good sense for us to provide against it all by making it forever impossible? Why risk a deluge of blood when we can stop it at its very source by this bond of peace?

Mr. President, nothing surprises me more than the baseless assertion that the league of nations, as agreed upon by some 30 nations of the earth, interferes in the remotest way in our immigration or tariff matters or other internationally recognized domestic concerns. Our domestic concerns are and always have been recognized by international law. Why demand now more specific application in the operations of the league? Why should it be made the basis of the covenant? The Supreme Court decided in Nishimura versus United States, involving the deportation of a Japanese woman, that:

"It is an accepted maximum of international law that every sovereign nation has the power as inherent in sovereignty and essential to self-preservation to forbid the entrance of foreigners within its dominions or to admit them only in such cases and upon such conditions as it may see fit to prescribe."

That being the recognized law of nations, the purposes of this league are certainly not to interfere with the recognized international law.

Import duties are just as completely within our sovereign jurisdiction, and to hold otherwise would take away the independence of the Nation. If these are accepted maxims of international law, why is it thought necessary to amend the covenant to specifically include immigration and tariff? It is impossible in the league to specifically include subjects already excluded in general terms. All other nations are as deeply interested as we are in preserving their sovereignty. Would France or England or Italy submit their domestic concerns to the decision of a league tribunal or place before it for decision their right to regulate immigration? For purpose of illustration, let us assume the impossible hypothesis, as cited by Mr. Taft, that the council would unanimously recommend that we admit Japanese citizens to our shores without restrictions; what would happen under the terms of article 15 of the league? We do not covenant to comply with the recommendation, nor are the other members of the league under any obligation to enforce it. Japan then might make war on us to compel the admission of her citizens to our shores. She can do that now without a league.

It is enough to say that if we should stop to make limitations or amendments or specify every domestic concern in order to keep the league of nations from interfering with it, this treaty, instead of being 240 or 250 pages long, would be extended to 8,000 pages.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Besides that, human nature not being infallible, we would have omitted a few and they would have been left out.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is true. We might have omitted some, and then another treaty would be required.

Mr. President, I have attempted to make it clear—

First, that this league of nations part of the treaty in no sense invades, assails, or limits the full sovereignty of the United States any more than any other of the many treaties limits it. All assertion to the contrary amounts only to charges against the treaty-making power as set forth in the Constitution itself.

Second, that the Monroe doctrine is eo nomine excluded from any jurisdiction of the league; that any amendment or reservation attempting to make this fact plainer or clearer is utterly useless. Exactly the same conditions arise in any effort by any power to override the Monroe doctrine as I have stated in the case of Japan attempting to force her nationals on us.

Third, that article 10 does not encroach on the power of Congress in any way whatever. Under that article, as without it, Congress can and will assess and collect taxes and expend the money thus derived. Congress alone can raise and equip armies. Congress alone can declare war. The existence or nonexistence of article 10 has no effect whatever on the power of Congress.

Fourth, that under the league, as freely as without it, our immigration laws, tariff impositions, voting qualifications, and all other purely domestic questions are unaffected.

These facts being manifest, in good faith I ask you opponents of the league of nations, why not quit trying to scare the people with these specters and hobgoblins scurrying among the ruins of our once glorious Constitution and meet the question fairly on the ground of policy? Is it better for the United States and for the peace of the world that we ratify this treaty just as it is? I, for one, am fully convinced that it is far better that it be so ratified and as early as possible. I shall attempt to give reasons for this conclusion before I take my seat.

Mr. President, the general unanimity of opposition to the league on the other side, with the variety of contradictory reasons for each position taken, would lead the normal thinking mind to conclude that a fixed, settled purpose to defeat it had been previously agreed upon. In the light of what has transpired and is now happening, I wonder what would have resulted if the President had submitted the league to these Senators and abided their conclusion before action at the conference table in Paris. He would have been there yet. While Senator KNOX was preserving the Constitution from amendment by treaty stipulation; while Senator REED was preserving the supremacy of the white race in world affairs from the wiles of the sagacious Senegambian armed and equipped with this peace treaty to discomfit by his ballot those white nations he could not destroy by his cunning; while Senator SHERMAN was brooding over a deep conspiracy lurking in this same league whereby the Pope of Rome is to become in turn the conqueror of the Senegambian and supreme ruler of the nations of the earth; while Senator LODGE was protecting, if need be with his blood, the Monroe doctrine from assaults that never had been nor ever would be made—and while all the balance, each with his groundless objections to this or that part of a section or line of the treaty—the President would have stood as helpless before this babel as Japan stood before the conference trying to change the immigration laws of England and America. He evidently would have had as much trouble with thirty-odd Senators over mere quibbles as he had with thirty-odd nations over questions of supreme national and international importance.

Having performed his great duty under the Constitution with rare judgment, tact, patience, and statesmanship, he submits the result of those labors, the best under the varied and trying circumstances that could be obtained, and asks your indorsement. Do you not, every one of you, really feel that the great effort to secure the peace of the world is worth trying out?

Having performed all our obligations under the treaty, we can withdraw from the league by giving a short two years' notice. What greater protection could you desire? We will be the sole judges as to whether we have performed our duty. I have before adverted to this, but I wish to put particular emphasis on this point again. The question was raised on the floor last week by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], one of the few logical opponents of the covenant, in his comments on the position taken by Senator SWANSON on this right of withdrawal on two years' notice. It was pertinently asked, Who is to be the judge as to whether, on giving due notice, we have performed our obligations? Clearly we are left the only judge of that question, and from our decision there can be no appeal. If the decision of that question was intended to be left to the council it would have been so stated. We were all dealing in good faith, and each signatory representing the sovereignty of his nation did not consent and would not have consented that the performance of duty by a sovereign State as that State saw its duty should be subjected to the judgment or decision of any other State or any number of them. The question of performance or nonperformance of a duty or obligation by any sovereignty, when no contrary binding provision is expressly stated in the stipulation, remains wholly with the sovereignty. Rights or powers of sovereignty can not be limited by implication.

If any other course had been intended, as I said before, it would have been stated in unmistakable terms.

It matters not how many votes the council or the assembly may contain so long as the treaty requires a unanimous vote to enter a war, or establish a blockade, or institute a commercial boycott. In all such cases the decision of our entering the fray rests with us. In every great responsible question this requirement of a unanimous vote leaves our action in our own hands for our own determination; and this right, when freely exercised, can bring no dishonor on our name or subject us to any just criticism by any member or members of the league.

This, with our further right to withdraw from the league on two years' notice, is sufficient guarantee against any possible harm to us or our institutions to allay—yes, to remove—all fear of any man, however timid, provided that he is also decently honest. In other words, every grave, important step is hedged about by a unanimous vote, and the withdrawal clause can intervene to prevent any action detrimental to us.

There is no question of our right to withdraw from the league on giving the two years' required notice and on our performance of all obligations as we see them and judge them for ourselves.

I repeat, Mr. President, can we not, in the presence of all these protective provisions, afford to go at slight expense hand in hand with the balance of the world a little distance in helping them, and they helping us, to stop useless bloodshed and cruel wars amongst us all? God give us the light to see our duty and the heart to perform it.

Mr. President, I think I am—I know I try to be—a very gentle judge of other men's motives and conduct; yet I can not suppress the expression of my doubt of the superior Americanism of certain opponents of this league just because, and only because, they themselves assert it. We who are trying to make secure the peace of the world love America just as much and have within us just as much Americanism as those truculent souls who would bathe her face in blood every morning. We are Americans just the same, but we must carefully distinguish between the desire for peace which springs from a timid soul seeking personal safety and that of a stout heart seeking the way of righteousness. This thought brings with it to my mind the late President Roosevelt and the part he is made to play in opposing this league of nations. When alive nobody dared speak for him; when dead, anybody can who will. Some tell us exactly what he thought of a league of nations that never appeared until long after his death. I prefer to take what Roosevelt said of his own position on a league of nations rather than words put in his cold, dead lips by any man whatever. No one doubted the Americanism of this great human dynamo. Let us ask him what he thought of a league to prevent war and let us take his answer from his own pen. He with all his fighting instincts delighted to be known as a peacemaker, as he in fact was, and for his services as such in 1910 he was awarded the Nobel peace prize, and in acknowledgment of that honor said:

> "It would be a master stroke if those great powers honestly bent on peace would form a league of peace, not only to keep the peace among themselves, but to prevent, by force, if necessary, its being broken by others."

He did not seem to be afraid of the constitutionality of that part of it.

> "The supreme difficulty in connection with developing the peace work of The Hague arises from the lack of any executive power, of any police power, to enforce the decrees of the courts."

In October, 1914, after the outbreak of this very war, Col. Roosevelt published an article in which he said:

> "The one permanent move for obtaining peace which has yet been suggested, with any reasonable chance of attaining its object, is by an agreement among the great powers, in which each should pledge itself not only to abide by the decisions of a common tribunal but to back with force the decision of that common tribunal. The great civilized nations of the world which do possess force, actual or immediately potential, should combine by solemn agreement in a great world league for the peace of righteousness. * * *
> "They should furthermore agree not only to abide, each of them, by the decision of the court, but all of them to unite with their military forces to enforce the decree of the court as against any recalcitrant member. Under these circumstances it would be possible to agree on a limitation of armaments that would be real and effective."

Can you Senators see any fear in that heart of any provision contained in article 10 of this treaty? The following year appeared his book "America and the World War," from which these passages are quoted:

"I earnestly hope that we shall ourselves become one of the joint guarantors of world peace under such a plan as that I in this book outline, and that we shall hold ourselves ready and willing to act as a member of the international posse comitatus to enforce the peace of righteousness as against any offender, big or small. * * * International peace will only come when the nations of the world form some kind of league * * * which puts the collective force of civilization behind such treaties and against any wrongdoing or recalcitrant nation. * * *

"The prime necessity is that all the great nations should agree in good faith to use their combined warlike strength to coerce any nation, whichever one it may be, that declines to abide the decision of some competent international tribunal."

As careful search as I have had time to make fails to reveal any change in Col. Roosevelt's views as above cited. And I think it safer for those who followed him to take what he said when alive as showing his attitude rather than what some one says he would say or should say or might say if he were now living. Let no one who loved, believed in, and followed Roosevelt balk at the alleged dangers lurking in this treaty when he, living, championed a league much more virile along the lines to which objection is now raised.

As suggested by Mr. Morefield Story, in a communication to me and other Senators:

"After months of negotiation their treaty is before us. No nation and no man made it or could make it. In all probability it satisfies no one, but it is the best result on which the nations could unite. Every negotiator has yielded something. Everyone can suggest changes which, in his judgment, would be improvements. Anyone can imagine disasters that may occur notwithstanding the treaty, or perhaps because of it, but it is not within the power of any man or any body of men to draw a treaty which no one can criticize, or which will insure perfect results in an imperfect world. The Senate of the United States can not make a new treaty, and if it refuses to ratify this one the only result must be new negotiations, sure to end in nothing that will satisfy everybody, and equally sure to be attended with ill-feeling and suspicion, which can hardly fail to leave behind them a dangerous international atmosphere."

Just for a moment think of the world being left as the war found it or of its being left as it now is; the preparedness necessary to meet the sure oncoming cataclysm; the explosives, the poisonous gases, the forts, guns, and ships; the airplanes and submarines, the countless men in standing armies, and the enormous fleets fretting the water of every sea; the pathways of the ocean sown with submerged batteries, involve such an expense of money and life that it is simply appalling. In view of this, what must be the condition of this country before the world—this country, which claimed to have entered the war for no selfish interests—if it now refuses to unite with other civilized nations in taking the little step toward better things to which the treaty commits us and them alike? It would be a shameful betrayal of civilization at the greatest crisis in history.

The treaty should be ratified as it stands. If it needs amendments, these amendments can be made hereafter, and are far more likely to be made if we have shown toward our Allies confidence and good will by agreeing to the mutual compact than if we now show suspicion of their honesty and exhibit a selfish disregard of every interest but our own.

As late as this last week all the objectors and amenders and reservationists have at last found a common ground of attack on the league of peace, by reason of what some of you have been pleased to call the rape of China; that having occurred, as alleged, through certain alleged concessions granted temporarily to Japan in Manchuria. The protection of the Constitution, the Monroe doctrine, immigration, and the sacred tariff were all forgotten or abandoned in order to save China. The tears, the screams of pain forced from lacerated hearts on that side of the Chamber must have an awful effect on the emotion of the gallery—for whom the show was designed—but those of us on the floor, with millions of others outside, who remember the serene faces of these actors, and their docile acquiescence when great Germany took this same country from helpless China, with greater detriment to the United States, will be pardoned if we refuse to dance to such music and keep our eyes dry in this deluge of crocodile tears. I do not like that concession to Japan; none of us like any concession.

I do not see how it could have been avoided. I was struck with—and I am sorry that every Senator did not hear—the argument yesterday on that particular question made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who has put a light upon it that at least soothes some of the lacerated hearts and probably cools somewhat the feverish imagination of some of our sympathetic friends on the other side of the Chamber.

As I said, I do not like that concession to Japan, but what more could have been done in the surrounding facts and circumstances than was done? We who permitted Germany, without protest, to seize this Chinese territory are in poor position to question the right of Japan who took it from Germany—from Germany, mind you, not from China—by force of arms.

Yet Senator LODGE does not want to see his country's name affixed to such a document. Strange he did not want his own name affixed to any protest against the far greater outrage by Germany on the possessions of China. Japan seized the country and concessions made to Germany by conquest. She held it under that title. She had as much right to it as Germany ever had. Her possession was less detrimental to us than Germany's possession had been. Then why these tears? Japan will keep her word with China and with the league. Without the league, in what better fix would China find herself? No need to pursue the inquiry. You all know the league does no avoidable injury to China. We all deplore the conditions, and can all see that the best possible results have been obtained. In the language of the street, "quit your kicking." I advise some of our friends to quit kicking and decide this question on the policy whether it is right or wrong.

Mr. President, I have spoken too long, but can not close without submitting some comments made by the able correspondent, Mr. Edward Price Bell, after hearing from the press gallery the speech last made by President Wilson before this body:

"President Wilson said all the nations of the world are crying out to their leaders to stop wars. It is so. He said fleets and armies, made by peoples in the hope of peace, have proved a lie. Who will dispute it? He is in favor of 'utterly destroying' the old order of international politics. Who that has read history or has a memory will not agree? 'Terror lies concealed in every balance of power.' Yes; terror, war, an imminent universal maelstrom of anarchy and blood. 'Civilization's united power must put a stop to aggression and give the world peace.' Yes; unless the world is to become a synonym for crimson chaos.

"We are liked in the world now, said Mr. Wilson. So we are liked for that in us which is good. Our position is one of unimpeachable primacy. Not in all history has any other nation been so elevated, so honored, so blessed, so burdened with a moral responsibility unescapable. Wide as our prosperous acres, deep as our mines, great as our industries, impressive as our genius and wealth is our duty. 'Our career has been one of service, not exploitation.' Undoubtedly. 'The light streams on the path ahead and nowhere else.' I can see it nowhere else. 'The league of nations is the only hope for mankind. Dare we reject it and break the heart of the world?' My reply would be that we shall not reject it and break the heart of the world if American leaders are fit to live in the same country with the American people."

AMERICAN TROOPS IN SIBERIA (S. DOC. NO. 60).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, 22 July, 1919.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

SIR: For the information of the Senate, and in response to the resolution adopted June 23, 1919, requesting the President to inform the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, of the reasons for sending United States soldiers to Siberia, the duties that are to be performed by these soldiers, how long they are to remain, and generally to advise the Senate of the policy of the United States Government in respect to Siberia and the maintenance of United States soldiers there, I have the honor to say that the decision to send American troops to Siberia was announced to the press on August 5, 1918, in a statement from the Acting Secretary of State, of which a copy is enclosed.

This measure was taken in conjunction with Japan and in concert of purpose with the other allied powers, first of all to save the Czecho-Slovak armies, which were threatened with destruction by hostile armies apparently organized by and often largely composed of enemy prisoners of war. The second purpose in view was to steady any efforts of the Russians at self-defense, or the establishment of law and order in which they might be willing to accept assistance.

Two regiments of infantry, with auxiliary troops—about 8,000 effectives—comprising a total of approximately 10,000 men, were sent under the command of Major General William S. Graves. The troops began to arrive at Vladivostok in September, 1918. Considerably larger forces were dispatched by Japan at about the same time, and much smaller forces by others of the allied powers. The net result was the successful reunion of the separated Czecho-Slovak armies and the substantial elimination in eastern Siberia of the active efforts of enemy prisoners of war. A period of relative quiet then ensued.

In February, 1919, as a conclusion of negotiations begun early in the summer of 1918, the United States accepted a plan proposed by Japan for the supervision of the Siberian railways by an international committee, under which committee Mr. John F. Stevens would assume the operation of the Russian Railway Service Corps. In this connection it is to be recalled that Mr. John F. Stevens, in response to a request of the provisional government of Russia, went to Russia in the spring of 1917. A few months later he was made official adviser to the minister of ways of communication at Petrograd under the provisional government. At the request of the provisional government, and with the support of Mr. John F. Stevens, there was organized the so-called Russian Railway Service Corps, composed of American engineers. As originally organized, the personnel of this corps constituted 14 skeleton division units as known in this country, the idea being that these skeleton units would serve as practical advisers and assistants on 14 different sections of the Siberian Railway and assist the Russians by their knowledge of long-haul problems as known in this country, and which are the rule and not the exceptions in Siberia.

Owing to the Bolshevik uprising and the general chaotic conditions, neither Mr. Stevens nor the Russian Railway Service Corps was able to begin work in Siberia until March, 1918. They have been able to operate effectively only since the railway plan was adopted in February, 1919.

The most recent report from Mr. Stevens shows that on parts of the Chinese-Eastern and Trans-Baikal Railway he is now running six trains a day each way, while only a little while ago they were only able to run that many trains a week.

In accepting the railway plan it was provided that some protection should be given by the allied forces. Mr. Stevens stated frankly that he would not undertake the arduous task before him unless he could rely upon support from American troops in an emergency. Accordingly, as provided in the railway plan and with the approval of the interallied committee, the military commanders in Siberia have established troops where it is necessary to maintain order at different parts of the line. The American forces under Gen. Graves are understood to be protecting parts of the line near Vladivostok, and also on the section around Verchne Udinsk. There is also understood to be a small body of American troops at Harbin. The exact location from time to time of American troops is, however, subject to change by the direction of Gen. Graves.

The instructions to Gen. Graves direct him not to interfere in Russian affairs, but to support Mr. Stevens wherever necessary. The Siberian Railway is not only the main artery for transportation in Siberia, but is the only open access to European Russia to-day. The population of Siberia, whose resources have been almost exhausted by the long years of war and the chaotic conditions which have existed there, can be protected from a further period of chaos and anarchy only by the restoration and maintenance of traffic on the Siberian Railway.

Partisan bands under leaders having no settled connection with any organized government, and bands under leaders whose allegiance to any settled authority is apparently temporary and transitory, are constantly menacing the operation of the railway and the safety of its permanent structures.

The situation of the people of Siberia meantime is that they have no shoes or warm clothing; they are pleading for agricultural machinery and for many of the simpler articles of commerce upon which their own domestic economy depends and which are necessary to fruitful and productive industry among them. Having contributed their quota to the Russian armies which fought the Central Empires for three and one-half years, they now look to the Allies and the United States for economic assistance.

The population of western Siberia and the forces of Admiral Kolchak are entirely dependent upon these railways.

The Russian authorities in this country have succeeded in shipping large quantities of Russian supplies to Siberia, and the Secretary of War is now contracting with the great cooperative societies which operate throughout European and Asiatic Russia to ship further supplies to meet the needs of the civilian population. The Kolchak Government is also endeavoring to arrange for the purchase of medical and other Red Cross supplies from the War Department, and the American Red Cross is itself attempting the forms of relief for which it is organized. All elements of the population in Siberia look to the United States for assistance. This assistance can not be given to the population of Siberia, and ultimately to Russia, if the purpose entertained for two years to restore railway traffic is abandoned. The presence of American troops is a vital element in this effort. The services of Mr. Stevens depend upon it, and, a point of serious moment, the plan proposed by Japan expressly provides that Mr. Stevens and all foreign railway experts shall be withdrawn when the troops are withdrawn.

From these observations it will be seen that the purpose of the continuance of American troops in Siberia is that we, with the concurrence of the great allied powers, may keep open a necessary artery of trade and extend to the vast population of Siberia the economic aid essential to it in peace time, but indispensable under the conditions which have followed the prolonged and exhausting participation by Russia in the war against the Central Powers. This participation was obviously of incalculable value to the allied cause, and in a very particular way commends the exhausted people who suffered from it to such assistance as we can render to bring about their industrial and economic rehabilitation.

Very respectfully, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I shall occupy the time of the Senate for a few moments only. I am not willing that the business of the week shall close without some observations upon a letter which has been issued by the ex-President with reference to the manner in which this treaty should be dealt with. I, perhaps, should not have given any attention to his observations with reference to reservations and interpretations had they not been preceded by a statement which is no less than amazing to me. This letter says in the very beginning:

> The partisan character of his administration—

Referring to the President—

> during the war, together with his appeal to his countrymen to elect a Democratic Congress in November, 1918, created a condition of personal and political antagonism toward him among Republican leaders which was shared by a majority of the American people. This was shown in the results of the election. Notwithstanding this, Mr. Wilson persisted in continuing the same partisan exclusion of Republicans in dealing with the highly important matter of settling the results of the war.
> He selected a commission in which the Republicans had no representation and in which there were no prominent Americans of any real experience and leadership of public opinion.

Without continuing the reading of the letter, upon this statement the ex-President bases his conclusion that the opposition to the league of nations and to the treaty with the league of nations incorporated arises very largely, if not wholly, out of personal dislike or personal opposition to the President. That is a very unfair, unjust, and unfounded statement. To assume that because there may or may not be personal antipathy between the President and Members of the Senate it would result in a Senator taking a position upon a question which involves upon one side, as it is claimed, the peace of the world, and upon the other the integrity and independence of American institutions is, to say the least, an amazing statement. In the debates running on through the days and weeks here in the Senate Chamber such statements coming from Senators in the heat of debate might be justified or overlooked, but deliberately to state to the American people, as this letter when taken as a whole does, that the opposition to the league of nations arises out of personal enmity is a challenge to the intellectual integrity and personal honor of every man who has voiced opposition to this program. I do not, of course, assume to speak for others, and yet I have no doubt I speak the sentiments of others when I say that opposition to the league of nations is based upon a sincere division of view as to its effect, both upon the peace of the world and upon our republican institutions. The questions of personal affronts, of personal dislikes could have no place in shaping a sane man's course in so grave a matter.

The view now entertained has long been entertained and often expressed by those in opposition to the league covenant, and long prior to the events or the incidents in the political history of the United States to which the ex-President refers as being the basis upon which the opposition rests. As early as January, 1917, two and one-half years ago, the debate in this Chamber began with reference to a league and with reference to the United States entering a league or becoming in any way allied with European powers. At that time it was contended upon the part of some of the supporters of the President that the President had not taken a definite position in regard to this matter; that he had not made up his mind as to whether it was a wise or an unwise procedure. But there was in this country and in England at that time an organization which was advocating that program. Out of the advocacy of that program by that particular organization arose the first debate that ever took place in the Senate, so far as my knowledge goes, in reference to this matter. The exact attitude of the President was then one of the questions debated. But the position of Mr. Taft, the Republican leader and ex-President, was well known. If the attack could be said to be individual it was more against the ex-President than the President. The opposition which was urged at that time by Senators, including myself, was based upon precisely the same principles upon which we urge our opposition to-day. There has been no change of program and no change of principles.

In support of what I have to say, I shall insert in the RECORD at the close of my remarks a portion of the first debate which took place with regard to this all-important subject. If those who are interested care to go back and examine that debate, it will be seen that the President's position at that time had not become definite. Mr. Taft's position was definite. Speaking for myself, I opposed the plan quite as earnestly and for the same reasons when Mr. Taft was practically its sole sponsor as I have after he and the President joined forces. One could well entertain the view, I imagine, that the President had been guilty of distasteful acts without permitting that to control his action with reference to as grave a matter as can come before Senators for their consideration.

At the time of that debate there could have been no such elements entering into the controversy as those mentioned by the ex-President, because they did not at that time exist. The incidents to which he refers with reference to leaving Republicans off the commission in Paris, with reference to leaving Senators off the commission, with reference to an appeal to the American people for a Democratic Congress, with reference to his partisan attitude concerning these things, were two and a half years, or at least two years, in advance of the time when this debate originally occurred. I say to the ex-President that whatever may be his reason for advocating a league of nations or whatever may be his reasons for changing his position in regard to amendments, the reason for opposition here is based upon an honest, sincere conviction that the proposed league will not promote peace, but will imperil the integrity and independence of our institutions. In that, of course, we may be in error; but the opinion is formed out of a study of these fundamental questions and not out of a personal like or dislike of the President of the United States.

Since this debate began and since men took a position upon this matter these same men have supported the President time and time again in very important affairs; they have stood by him at a time when many other men who are now supporting him in his league of nations were opposed to his policy. I refer to this, as it may be of some interest for the ex-President to inform himself concerning the history of his country for the last two and a half years and not concentrate his attention so much upon the league of nations and its fanciful effect. Anyone who will go back through these debates for nearly three years will come to at least one conclusion, that those who have lead the opposition from the beginning have been open, sincere, and resolute, for they have fought against heavy odds and at great political hazard every inch of the ground.

Mr. President, I am not interested in any form of interpretations or amendments or reservations. No amendments or reservations which leaves us in an alliance or league with European or Asiatic powers will satisfy me. I speak only for myself. I am opposed to this proposition upon fundamental grounds. I do not want ever to be placed in a position where I shall be compelled to cast a final vote for amendments or have no vote at all upon this subject, or where I shall be compelled to cast a final vote for reservations or have no vote at all. I shall be very happy if the votes in the Senate Chamber hold this issue down to the proposition, so that the ultimate vote will be cast absolutely for or against alliance or no alliance with European powers. It is either fundamentally right to enter into this enterprise or it is fundamentally wrong, as I view it. If it is fundamentally right, I do not expect the President of the United States or any other man to perfect the instrument in the first instance; no one but the divine power Himself can, without experience, perfect a thing out of mind; and, if it is fundamentally a correct proposition, I am not going to waste my time with reference to details in regard to it.

To my mind it is fundamentally wrong to draw this Republic into the political alliances of Europe. I do not care whether we proceed a part of the way to-day, and expect to proceed the rest of the way to-morrow; it is the same thing; we are entering into alliances with European powers. Therefore, so far as I am concerned, I trust that that will happen which some Senators upon the other side indicate their desire to have happen, and that is upon the final vote we will be permitted to meet fully and fairly the question of whether we shall have any alliance or league with European powers. I want a chance to record my vote against the whole scheme to ally this Republic and our people with Europe. If Senators on the other side will stand against reservations or amendments, other than those which go to the heart of the question, we will have an opportunity to vote against any league with Europe. I want no amendments which deal with immaterial matters and leave the vital question unchanged.

Mr. President, when the fathers submitted the Constitution to the States there were men in those days who thought they could have interpretations, reservations, and explanations with reference to going into the Union. They were very closely pressed for votes in Virginia, and so they put in a clause in the ratification resolution of Virginia which reads as follows:

> We declare and make known that the powers granted under the Constitution, being derived from the people of the United States, may be resumed by them whensoever the same shall be perverted to their injury or oppression.

New York in her ratification resolution stated:

> The powers of government may be resumed by the people whensoever it shall become necessary to their happiness.

Rhode Island said:

> The powers of government may be resumed by the people whenever it shall become necessary to their happiness.

Other States put in interpretations and reservations and withdrawal privileges, but when the time came to invoke the reservations upon which they relied at the time they joined the league or the covenant or the constitution the powers construing the covenant or constitution paid no attention to them whatever. We may put reservations and constructions into the covenant; but, even if we do, we will then turn the construction of the covenant over to the nine men sitting at Geneva. Suppose Brazil puts a construction upon article 21 and says, "Our understanding in subscribing to this covenant is that the league of nations has power to construe the Monroe doctrine," as England says it has, and the United States puts a construction upon it when it subscribes to the covenant, saying, "Our understanding is that the Monroe doctrine is to be construed by the United States alone"; and the question comes before the council of five or nine as to whether they will give any consideration to the construction placed upon it by Brazil and by the United States. They will do precisely as the United States Supreme Court did in the case of White against Texas, in Seventh Wallace. They will say: "Having entered the covenant, having become a part of the constitution, having accepted your position in this organization which was submitted to you, the construction of your attitude will be determined under the covenant under which you have proceeded to exercise your right to be here." Unless the amendments or reservations which we adopt go back to the powers submitting this treaty and are by those powers accepted and made a part of the treaty by the common consent of all parties, the amendments or reservations will be utterly useless, will bind nobody, and will be no protection to the United States whatever.

Let the people of this country who are opposed to entering into an alliance with Europe, who are opposed to surrendering the policy of Washington and the doctrine of Monroe, understand that reservations, like political platforms, unless they are conditional upon acceptance by the other powers, are made to get votes and not for the purpose of standing upon them after they once get in. The tactics now is to get votes, and, as Mr. Taft in effect says, we will bait our hook with interpretations. But after we are once in the league, then the council at Geneva, from whose judgment there is no appeal, begins its latitudinous and political constructions and our interpretations will not even be given the "cold respect of a passing glance." The Senators who cast the votes and soothe their consciences with interpretations will have passed on, but the people of the United States will be here and will be informed by the council of Geneva that your individual interpretations were never accepted by the other members of the league. Those interpretations were politics. All amendments should go to the vital question of alliance or no alliance with European powers, and ratification should be conditioned upon their affirmative acceptance.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand that the Senator is opposed to any reservation or interpretation or condition or amendment of any kind to the proposed treaty? I understand the Senator takes that position?

Mr. BORAH. What I say and what I hope is that I will have an opportunity to vote against the treaty in its entirety. Of course, if reservations and amendments are offered and the parliamentary situation is such that that is the only opportunity I shall have to record a view, I shall undoubtedly vote for them, but I am utterly opposed to any league or political alliance, and if I had my way about it I would never submit a single interpretation or amendment except one that would end the whole thing.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then, I understand the Senator further to be opposed to any sort of a league or alliance or covenant with other nations in the direction intended to be reached by the league of nations.

Mr. BORAH. I am utterly opposed to it. I want no political partnership or alliance or league which commits us to meddling in European affairs.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then, the Senator is opposed to the proposed treaties with France and with England?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I am opposed to them.

Mr. FLETCHER. So that the Senator is opposed to any alliance or cooperation with foreign nations of any sort?

Mr. BORAH. Absolutely. Do not misunderstand me for a moment. I stand for the policy of this Government as it has existed for 150 years; that is good enough for me. I prefer to take my chances with this Republic and the people who shall govern it and direct its policies rather than to embarrass it and entangle it with the Governments of Europe. I take this position for two principal among many reasons. Entangling alliances with Europe—I do not care what you put on paper or how beautifully you phrase your league covenants—mean war for our people about things which are of no or only remote concern to our people. It means that our young men will be called upon to suffer and sacrifice in those racial, territorial, and dynastic quarrels, 23 of which are going on now. Your league will not bring peace. The causes of war can not be removed by the mere writing of a covenant, nor can those causes be controlled by any five or nine men. The causes of war lie deep in the structure of European society, and this treaty which lies before us has done much to perpetuate and keep alive those causes.

I take this position for the further reason that you can not enter this league, or any league, worthy of the name without surrendering some of the self-governing powers of the American people, without forfeiting some of the independence of this Republic. These are things, our right to govern ourselves untrammeled by foreign powers and our complete independence as a Nation, which we have always been willing to defend even with arms. I shall never vote to surrender or even jeopardize them. No one will ever have power by my vote to shape the policies or determine the course or the obligations of the United States other than the people of the United States themselves.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I wish to know if I understood the Senator from Idaho correctly a few moments ago when he said that, if the Senators upon this side of the Senate shall oppose all amendments and reservations, it was his opinion that the ratification of the treaty would be defeated? Did I understand the Senator to say that?

Mr. BORAH. No; what I said was that I hoped we would have an opportunity to vote straight upon the question of alliance or no alliance with European powers. I hope, however, that if the league is still in the treaty the inference the Senator draws will be correct.

Mr. President, to take an illustration, we have heard a vast amount of discussion about the Monroe doctrine and about how we are going to preserve the Monroe doctrine by reservations. The Monroe doctrine can not be preserved, it does not make any difference what is put upon paper, if we surrender the policy of Washington. The policy of Washington includes the Monroe doctrine. In other words, if we intermeddle in European affairs and become a part of the European system and go to Europe and take part in European concerns, we can not, in the practical affairs of life, prevent Europe from coming to America. It does not make any difference what is written upon paper; we may put upon paper that the Monroe doctrine shall be preserved in its integrity; but, if we intermeddle in European affairs, the remorseless logic of events will carry Europe to America. If we take part in the concerns of Europe, we may flatter ourselves that we can hold America aloof from Europe, but the silent trend of inevitable facts will soon disillusion our people.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator's attitude is identical with that which I took in 1900, when the Spanish-American treaty was being negotiated, one of the results of which was our acquisition of the Philippine Islands. I am curious to know if the Senator believes, as I then believed and still believe, that that treaty, followed by our acquisition of that distant oriental system of islands, was not an act upon our part which materially weakened the consistency of our attitude regarding the Monroe doctrine?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, Mr. President; I think the Senator is correct. I regretted the acquiring of the Philippines, and five years ago I voted to turn them loose.

Mr. THOMAS. So did I.

Mr. BORAH. And I am anxious to get an opportunity to do so again.

Mr. THOMAS. So am I.

Mr. BORAH. If I have had a conviction throughout my life with which it has been possible for me to be consistent at all times, it has been the conviction that we should stay out of European and Asiatic affairs. I do not think that we can have here a great, powerful, independent, self-governing Republic and do anything else; I do not think it is possible for us to continue to be the leading intellectual and moral power in the world and do anything else. I do not think we can successfully achieve the task now confronting us, that of establishing here an industrial democracy, as we have achieved a political democracy, and do anything else.

I desire to refer a little further to the question of preserving the Monroe doctrine. Mr. Jefferson understood perfectly that we could not preserve the Monroe doctrine unless we kept our part and remained out of European affairs, and he so stated very plainly. There were none of the early constructionists or the fathers who dealt with this subject who contemplated anything else, and I say now that those who are willing to surrender Washington's policy and at the same time suppose they can preserve the Monroe doctrine are contemplating the impossible. If I could have my way about it, I would preserve Washington's policy and let the Monroe doctrine take care of itself, if I had to let either take care of itself. Mr. President, we had just as well talk about tearing away the lower story of a house and leaving the upper story stand in mid-air as to tear away Washington's policy and leave the Monroe doctrine intact. One is built upon the other and can not exist without it.

So Mr. Taft's theory of preserving the Monroe doctrine, by a clause which he suggests, would be utterly futile. There is just one way to preserve the Monroe doctrine, and that is to stay out of European affairs and Asiatic affairs.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest to the Senator that the question to be considered is whether or not we are able to stay out of European affairs and Asiatic affairs in these times. We can, of course, refrain from making any contract. But has not this war demonstrated conclusively that we may not be able to be entirely left to our own will about how we shall act and what we shall do in case of trouble in Europe?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it is much easier to stay out of the political affairs of Europe than when Washington was President. But let us assume for the sake of the argument that a condition may again arise when we shall want to take part in some European conflict. Shall we contract in advance that we will do so without consulting the intelligence and the patriotism of the particular hour in which the crisis arises? Shall we say now that 10 years from now, or 20 years from now, we will take part in a European war if the territorial integrity of some nation is involved, without consulting the intelligence and the patriotism of the particular generation that will have to fight that war? Shall we, who can not know the facts, take from those who will know the facts the right to pass upon that stupendous question free of all previous obligation?

Let me give an illustration. Suppose the Senator has a son who is 10 or 15 years of age, and in 10 years from now he has reached the point where, if a war occurs in Europe, he is called upon to perform his part of service as a soldier of his country. A condition arises in Europe which calls for action and consideration. We are to meet the question of whether or not we are to take part in that particular conflict. The young man looks over the situation and he finds that he is not permitted as a citizen to exercise his judgment about it at all. His father had contracted 15 years before that he shall do so, whether he thinks the war is a righteous war or not. He finds that if a piece of territory is involved it has been agreed he shall go, although he might think the war was unjust. Is that free citizenship? And can a government be a free government which is not permitted to pass upon the facts and circumstances as they arise instead of being contracted in previous years to perform the service whether it wants to or not?

Mr. FLETCHER. I should say as to that that I ought, if possible, to bring about a condition of things now where that supposed son of mine would not be compelled either to take part in a European war or to decide the question which the Senator has suggested. In other words, that is quite a different proposition from the proposal now to endeavor to bring about a condition of things which will insure not only that such a thing as the Senator imagines might occur never can occur, but that such a thing as has recently occurred in Europe never can happen again. As I understand it, that is the purpose of the proposed league. Furthermore, the power to declare war is still left with Congress, as it would be without a league.

Mr. BORAH. Technically I will concede that that is true; but morally and in practice we would be bound to carry out our treaty and the declaration of war by Congress would be in obedience to the treaty merely a perfunctory matter. Congress would not be free to consider alone the then existing situation. But, Mr. President, if the Senator from Florida really believes that this organization is going to prevent war, he entertains a belief which no one who had to do with the organization of it entertained. Why, before they ever left the council table where they had written this league which was to insure peace, they wrote an alliance which was to take care of the next war. Mr. Clemenceau, Mr. Lloyd-George, the representative of Italy, and the representative of Japan—I do not know about the President—would not permit the council to break up until they had prepared for war by an alliance between France and Great Britain, and France and the United States, into which Italy has already asked permission to come. That alliance was made for war, in contemplation of war, in expectation of war, and to take care of war. Not only that, but if this copy of the treaty which was inserted yesterday be correct, Mr. Clemenceau was not willing that the program should proceed to a consummation until the alliance was taken care of, until the war was provided for. There are 23 wars, as I have said, now in progress in Europe. Most of them are over international boundaries, and if this league were in effect we would be there now. And yet who would sacrifice the lives of American boys to determine who should own a particular piece of real estate in some worthless part of Europe—like Siberia, for illustration.

Why are we in Russia at this time? Have we any war with Russia? Are we in conflict with Russia? Have we declared war upon Russia? You say the Congress of the United States has the power to declare war. Have we declared war upon Russia? If not, why are our boys in Russia? Who ordered them there? The council sitting at Geneva will direct that certain steps be taken; and while I will accede to the proposition that technically the Congress of the United States could refuse to declare war, yet the moral pressure which would be brought to bear upon Congress to comply with the action at Geneva would practically deprive it of its legal power to do so. It is one thing to have the technical, legal power to do so; it is another thing to have the moral courage to carry out your legal obligations; and right now, at this time, we are being told by the able Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] that the reason why we should indorse this treaty and ratify it is not necessarily because of its inherent worth, but because the wise men at Versailles have passed upon it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is a great admirer and adherent of the Monroe doctrine. Does he think that when that doctrine was enunciated in 1823 it was to prepare for war?

Mr. BORAH. Not necessarily; no.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does he not believe that it served to prevent war?

Mr. BORAH. I think, in a measure, it did. But such a principle would not last overnight in Europe.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Did it ever cost us a dollar or a man?

Mr. BORAH. I do not think it has cost us a man, but it has cost us some money.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now, then, if the effect of the Monroe doctrine was not to prepare for war and if the Monroe doctrine had any effect to preserve peace, why does the Senator say that this proposed arrangement with France is to prepare for war? Is it not to prevent war?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the alliance with France operates only in contemplation of war. It is made in expectation of war. It is made in expectation of that which, I think, will happen. As to the Monroe doctrine, it was effective here, for many reasons which would not obtain in Europe. The Senator leaves out of consideration the fact that he is dealing with two distinct civilizations—wholly different governmental institutions, races, and customs. A Monroe doctrine in Europe goes by the name of Holy Alliance or balance of power, but nothing of threat or combination of nations has been able to keep the peace in Europe, and neither will this combination prevent war.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator answer: Was not the Monroe doctrine announced in the face of threats from European nations to make war on American Republics and was not the effect of our declaration to prevent them from doing so? And if the Senator admits that, and even if he contends that Germany is preparing for war on France, how can be deny that with our agreement and Great Britain's agreement to come to the rescue of France it will have the same effect in Europe that the Monroe doctrine had in America?

Mr. BORAH. I think, Mr. President, that the mere fact that we agree to come to the protection of France or to the service of France will have very little effect upon Germany when Germany feels that she is strong enough to regain what she feels have been unjustly taken from her, and evidently that is precisely what the premier thinks. That is not only true of Germany but of other powers. But, Mr. President, suppose that the war does arise. Suppose that the unexpected happens. Does not the Senator think that we ought to have, free of all contractural obligations, the right of an independent and free people to determine, upon all the circumstances under which it arises, whether we shall go to war or not? Does he not think that when that condition comes we ought to be a free people to determine whether we should take part in that conflict? Now, the Monroe doctrine was always our doctrine and it left us free in every emergency to decide for ourselves, unembarrassed by agreements with other nations, what we should do.

I do not say that we should not go to the rescue of France in case Germany assaults her. I am not arguing that question at all; but I do say that if that condition ever arose the people of that particular time, judging all the facts as they should then exist, should have the right to determine whether or not they should go to war, free of any obligation whatever to take anyone else's construction.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the United States should take the same position that the Senator takes, Germany would not know whether the United States would come to the rescue of France or not, and Germany might make the same mistake that she made when she entered the late war, and provoke a war; but the Senator well knows that if Germany is convinced in advance that an attempt to undo the results of this war will result in the same parties coming in to preserve those results, Germany will not make the attempt. The whole virtue of this knowledge in advance is to prevent war; whereas the Senator, by leaving that in doubt, would induce war.

Mr. BORAH. Well, now, if it is a question of affecting the mental attitude of Germany, does not the Senator think that the league of nations—in which we agree to protect the territorial integrity of France and the political independence of France—does he not think that the league of nations of itself, without an alliance, would be sufficient? If it is a mere question of an attitude of mind, is not the league, with its powerful organization of which the Senator speaks, a sufficient force to impress itself upon Germany, without a special alliance within the league?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will say to the Senator that that is my opinion, but the situation is exactly the same as though the Senator were giving me a note in the case of money loaned, and the note were perfectly good. If some one else were to sign that note in addition to the Senator, it would not impair the note, and it might make it, in the opinion of some people, a little stronger.

Mr. BORAH. But, Mr. President, there is nobody else signing. The United States is simply signing twice. It does not add anything to my material wealth if I sign the Senator's note twice. It does not add anything to his security if he brings me a contract to sign and I sign it, and he brings me the same contract to-morrow and I sign it again.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is bringing in, somewhat in advance, the treaty with France. I have stated that I think it is not necessary. I believe that the people of the United States hardly think it is necessary. I believe that they deem the league of nations entirely sufficient; but that is not true with France. France has lived in fear of Germany for generations, and France is still pursued with that fear. France knows that the league of nations is a new venture. It is something in the nature of a new creation. France also knows that the league of nations does not spring into existence immediately. France asks for something to bridge over temporarily, for a few years, that period.

Mr. BORAH. Temporarily.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now then, Mr. President, France having asked that thing, what will happen if we refuse it? What happens to the public opinion in France, and what, moreover, happens to the public opinion in Germany? What will be the effect upon the German mind of having the United States refuse to guarantee the results of this war?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we are to guarantee the security and safety of France temporarily, under the alliance, until the league gets into action. Now, if there is anything in the world that is certain it is that Germany can not attack anybody for the next 20 years, because under this treaty she will never have anything with which to attack. She is a perfectly powerless nation to-day. She is reduced to helplessness, and precautions are taken in the treaty to see that that helplessness continues for at least 15 or 20 years. In my judgment it will be 30. Now, the alliance is to take care of a temporary situation. Does the Senator think that it will take the league of nations from 15 to 20 years to get into effective organization? Why, Col. House and Lord Cecil and those people have practically got it completed now. Even before it has been ratified we have a permanent secretary, who is there for life, and they are meeting and organizing and appointing, creating bureaus, and so forth. It will be in existence, in so far as it can ever have any existence, in six months after the ratification, as much as it will ever be. No; that is not what is the trouble with Clemenceau.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator omits one very important thing. Germany will not be a member of the league. Germany will not, therefore, be under the restraints and the obligations of the league.

Mr. BORAH. But under article 11 we can deal with Germany or any other nation upon the face of the earth if they create the slightest disturbance.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. A nation might not create a disturbance, and yet she might be preparing to do so. Germany, if she were a member of the league, could not even prepare.

Mr. BORAH. She can not prepare under this treaty for the next 30 years.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But the Senator is opposed to the ratification of this treaty.

Mr. BORAH. If you will take the league out of it, I will talk with you about it. There are things in the treaty which I am utterly opposed to, and they will have to come out before I will vote for it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. Assume that the covenant for a league of nations were stricken out of the treaty, then what means would there be whereby to compel Germany to carry out the stipulations of the treaty?

Mr. BORAH. The terms of the treaty, if I read it correctly, are quite sufficient for that purpose for the next 30 years.

Mr. POMERENE. Not so long as Germany continues to consider all treaties as "scraps of paper," and that is what she will regard this one to be.

Mr. BORAH. But we do not permit Germany, under this treaty, to act upon the same principle that she did with reference to the Belgian treaty. We have possession and control, and we continue to retain physical, material possession of Germany, and control her so as to deprive her of the power to act in any aggressive way at all for the next 25 or 30 years, and therefore I do not see any necessity for the league, so far as Germany is concerned.

Mr. President, just a paragraph more and I will conclude. As I said a moment ago, these reservations and amendments or interpretations based upon any other theory than that of the return of the treaty to the other powers for their affirmative acceptance would be a deception of the American people. It would be misleading them in the most important affairs of the national life. Mere amendments or interpretations or reservations unaccepted would be wholly worthless. They would not protect us in the future. We must deal with this important matter frankly, openly, and upon vital lines. We must not pretend to do what we do not in fact do. Amendments or reservations which leave us in the league with jurisdiction granted to the league to embroil us in European affairs, if accepted, would be objectionable to me. I would like to see any such alliance avoided. But at any rate, every Senator has a right to ask that in pretending to amend we actually and unmistakably amend.

Mr. President, I ask permission to insert as a part of my speech some observations which were made January 5, 1917, on this subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that action will be taken.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"Friday, January 5, 1917.

"NO ENTANGLING ALLIANCES.

"Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I address myself to this subject with admitted embarrassment. If it were a subject dealing exclusively with matters concerning our own Government and our own people, I should feel at ease in expressing any views which I might entertain with regard to it. I realize, however, that this subject affects other people more vitally than even our own; and I think I appreciate, in part at least, that it is almost impossible for us to view this matter from the angle of vision from which it is viewed by other Governments and by other nations. In expressing ourselves, some things which we might say, while entirely agreeable to our own views and the views perhaps of our own people, might be viewed from a different standpoint by those of other nations. I therefore desire to premise my remarks by saying that I express my views with entire tolerance toward those entertaining different views, whether entertained here at home or abroad. I wish in no way to impeach the understanding or the viewpoint of others, but alone to give expression to the reasons which shall control my action with reference to this matter.

"The President of the United States had a perfect right to send a note looking toward peace and to initiate a movement which might result in peace. He not only had the right to do so but if there was in his possession information which convinced him as the President that such a course was a wise one, and might and probably would result in something effectual, it was his duty to do so. Furthermore, so far as this debate is concerned, in any view that I may express I shall assume, and conclusively assume, that the President had sufficient information before him, as the one representative of our Government authorized to deal with this matter, to warrant him in the belief that the step which he took was justified, and that he had given to the matter that reflection and consideration which the gravity of the subject would command from anyone whose duty it was to act in regard to it.

"But if the Senate of the United States acts in regard to this matter, it will intrude itself into an affair of the utmost delicacy and of the most tremendous consequences, without any information other than that which we gather from the newspapers and from the general sources of information. If we act in regard to it at all, we will act without relationship to that part of the Government upon which devolves action at this time, without information, and without, in my judgment, sufficient reflection—that is, that reflection which should have taken place before the debate began. In other words, Mr. President, we are in an entirely different situation than that of the President; and it is no part of my purpose in this debate to assume to criticize the action taken by the President in sending this note. I hold to some rules of freedom in criticizing the action of a President in domestic matters, but when I am at all permitted to do so I prefer to remain silent in foreign matters.

"If the matter had remained where, in my judgment, it should have remained, I should have felt it my duty as a Member of this body to remain entirely silent with regard to the subject matter, notwithstanding that I might have differed with the President both as to the timeliness of the note and as to its contents. Realizing, as I think I do—and I speak with entire sincerity with regard to that—that the movement was initiated with the hope that it would accomplish something, I should have felt it my duty to remain entirely silent as to the mode of procedure, either as to the expressions of the note or as to the time when it was submitted to the foreign nations. But it is here now, Mr. President, certainly by no choosing of mine, and I am called upon to cast a vote which, if in the affirmative, in my judgment, as the resolution stands, will obligate me to a course which does not at this time commend itself to my judgment, and particularly to statements in the note with which I am in utter disagreement.

"I do not admit, Mr. President, since this resolution is here voluntarily, not at the suggestion of the President, but purely as the voluntary act of the Senate, that I am in any sense whatever assuming to criticize the President for the performance of his function and of his duty by disagreeing to the resolution and thereby disagreeing to the contents of the note. I am justified in that position, I think, by the fact that if this matter had been sent here at the suggestion of the President, or by reason of a message from the President, a different situation would present itself. But coming solely from the action of the Senate, without any suggestion upon the part of that particular official who, under our form of government, has to deal with this matter at this time, it seems that we may deal with it with entire freedom and without being placed in the position of assuming to criticize those who have viewed it from a different standpoint and with different obligations.

"I read this morning in the New York papers that the President's secretary is authority for the direct statement that Mr. Wilson is entirely indifferent as to what the Senate or the House does about the peace note. I have every reason to believe, in view of the silence of the Chief Executive, that we are permitted to dispose of this matter according to our own judgments and our own consciences, without being placed in the position of criticizing the action of the President.

"As I say, however, the note is here, and we have to deal with it and with all its contents under this particular form of resolution. It brings up for discussion and consideration some of the most important questions with which this body has had to deal since the beginning of the Government. I would like my colleagues to reflect upon this proposition that if this note contains the language which I believe it to contain, having the meaning which I understand it to have, initiating an entirely new policy on the part of this Government, when this body and the House pass upon it, then that department of the Government which fixes the policies of the country will have approved and initiated a new policy.

"If the note contains what I believe it to contain—an expression of view with reference to our foreign policy in the future, an entire change of policy with reference to our foreign affairs—and this body and the other member of the legislative branch of the Government indorse it, it is a confirmation and an establishment, this side of an actual treaty, of the policy which is outlined in the note. There is no other step to be taken in regard to it except its actual carrying out by treaties made; and the Senate of the United States would not be entirely free to reject a treaty covering a policy which the Senate, after due deliberation and consideration, had affirmed.

"Mr. President, just before the battle upon the plains of Marengo which seemed to place Napoleon well on the way of realizing his dreams of ambition, the Father of our Country was in retirement at Mount Vernon. A condition prevailed in Europe quite similar to the condition which prevails in Europe at this time. Napoleon, as I say, seemed in the way of realizing his ambition. Before his gigantic schemes thrones were toppling and dynasties disappearing; and it was understood that his plans encompassed the universal dictatorship of Europe, if not of the civilized world. Under those conditions Washington, in his retirement, wrote to a friend with reference to conditions in Europe and his views concerning them. His letter so fully expresses the view which I entertain with regard to the present situation, and so much more adequately than it would be possible for me to state it, that I am going, in the beginning of my remarks, to call attention to it. If history be correct, it was the last letter that the Father of our Country wrote upon any subject—certainly of public affairs:

"The affairs of Europe have taken a most important and interesting turn. What will be the final results of the uninterrupted successes of the combined army it is not for a man at a distance of 3,000 miles from the great theater of action to predict; but he may wish and ardently wish, from principles of humanity and for the benevolent purpose of putting a stop to the further effusion of human blood, that the successful powers may know at what point to give cessation to the sword for the purpose of negotiation.

"That expresses the great hope of all Americans that the great powers engaged in this conflict may realize or know the point at which the sword should give way to negotiations. In other words, while I presume we all have our views in regard to this conflict, and none of us stand entirely neutral in mind and in heart, whatever we may try to do officially, I assume that no American reflecting upon the affairs of Europe for the last hundred years wants to see any one of the belligerent powers dismembered and broken up. No one desires to see any one of the nations of Europe crushed. We hope that no attempt will be made to crush any one of those peoples. Our greatest hope is that these powers will appreciate the time when they should cease the conflict and enter upon negotiations; and, expressing my own view, at least, I trust that will be before an attempt is made upon the part of either side to absolutely crush and destroy any one of the nations engaged in this conflict.

"There is one lesson of history which the people of Europe by this time ought fully to understand; that is, that whatever may be the power behind the movement or the influence which controls in the particular hour, it is practically impossible to destroy any nation where there has come to exist a real spirit of nationality. Over a century ago three of the great European powers dismembered and divided Poland. One of the rulers said, after the infamous deed was finished, that Poland had been disposed of by pen and ink; but Poland was not thus disposed of. She is now one of the vital, moving, controlling, dominating forces in this conflict, over a hundred years after. That crushed and dismembered nation has been the nerve of every revolution against absolutism in Europe from the time it was divided until this hour. The Polish patriots scattered over the face of Europe have either initiated or substantially supported the great revolutions against autocratic power from the time the autocrats of Europe divided it until now. I say, again, that the fondest hope of America is that these nations engaged in war, fighting, as they believe, for their security and their existence, may nevertheless realize the proper hour in which to lay aside the sword and take up negotiations.

"Further says the Father of his Country:

"My own wish is to see everything settled upon the best and surest foundation for the peace and happiness of mankind, without regard to this, that, or the other nation.

"I repeat, Mr. President, that undoubtedly every Member of this body, and I presume that practically all throughout the country have their views, their sentiments, their opinions, their partisanship, with regard to this conflict. But whatever may be our views with regard to the governing power or the ruling class in this or that country there goes out from the heart of America to all the people, to the masses engaged in the conflict, regardless of nationalities, one common sentiment, and that is one of profound sympathy for the masses of the people, regardless of the kind of government which presides over their destinies. I find a complete expression of my views in the language of the Father of his Country when he says:

"My own wish is to see everything settled upon the best and surest foundation for the peace and happiness of mankind, without regard to this, that, or the other nation.

"Could there be anyone in all America so unconscionable as not to desire peace? If we should pass a resolution here merely in favor of peace it would but express the axiom of the American heart. But on the other hand can there be anyone so unreflective as not to want permanent peace; peace founded in justice and in righteousness, and therefore permanent peace?

"Mr. President, I am going to put aside many of the minor matters which I deem to be involved in this debate, because, first, I know I shall not be able to cover them so well as they have already been covered by others speaking upon the subject; and, secondly, because I could waive in deference to the supposed cause of peace, since the resolution is here, every question involved in this note except one, and with reference to that I could not give my consent to vote for a resolution which even seems to indicate an approval of it. Since the resolution is here, though I believe it ought not to be here, I would put aside all objections save one, and that is vital and controlling, and not even in the cause of supposed peace will I seem to indorse it.

"According to my limited vision of governmental affairs and the future happiness of this Nation, if I am not misled as to the contents of this note, there is a proposition involved in it of far more concern to the people of the United States than anything which we have had before us at this session or will have before us during many sessions to come. I desire to go to that, and when I shall have expressed myself fully in regard to it I will leave the subject matter so far as I am concerned, and not consume time with other matters, though they are not unimportant.

"Let us not seek to minimize the importance of this matter nor undertake to delude ourselves with the thought that the issue is not here. If we are going to pass this resolution and do not want to pass upon this subject, then the language of the resolution should be changed. We shall not be able to satisfy ourselves or our people when they come to reflect upon this record that the issue concerning which I propose to speak is not an issue in this debate. The language of the note to which I have reference is as follows:

"In the measures to be taken to secure the future peace of the world the people and Government of the United States are as vitally and as directly interested as the Governments now at war. Their interest, moreover, in the means to be adopted to relieve the smaller and weaker peoples of the world of the peril of wrong and violence is as quick and ardent as that of any other people or government. They stand ready, and even eager, to cooperate in the accomplishment of these ends, when the war is over, with every influence and resource at their command.

"In other words, we as a nation are not only interested in the future welfare of the small nations of Europe, which, of course, we are, but we propose as a manifestation of our interest to make ready to achieve their protection and their integrity by every influence and every resource at our command. This means, if it means anything at all, that the Army and the Navy of the United States, the last and greatest resource for such things, will be at the command of any plan agreed upon between this Government and the nations of Europe for the protection of the small nations of that country. When the war is over, the note says, with every influence and resource at our command we will protect from violence or wrong all these small nations. Could a more stupendous proposition be presented to our people? Could a single proposition involving more completely the peace and contentment of this Republic for all time to come be submitted to this body for consideration?

"Mr. President, it might be said in regard to this language that this is too free a construction of it, and that contention has been made by the brilliant Senator from Illinois [Mr. Lewis]. But the same cautious and conservative gentleman whose name is attached to this note in an interview shortly thereafter—the next day, I think—gave expression to the interpretation which should be placed upon this part of the note, and discussed freely, apparently from the newspaper reports, what it meant. Amongst other things the paper says:

"Secretary Lansing apparently favors the idea of the United States joining with other European nations in a compact to preserve peace, because he regards some such measure essential in the light of present international conditions.

"The United States is no longer in a position to remain indifferent to wars in Europe. American interests are bound to be seriously and vitally affected, as indeed they have been in the present war, and American rights are, Mr. Lansing has pointed out, necessarily placed in jeopardy.

"The views of Mr. Lansing are along the line of the statements made by President Wilson last May in indorsing the League to Enforce Peace. Mr. Wilson at that time said the present war had demonstrated that in future wars of the present magnitude it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, for the United States to remain neutral.

"Let us go back a little further. There is an organization in this country called the League to Enforce Peace. Among its members are some of our most distinguished educators and publicists and statesmen. Its president is the ex-President of the United States, Mr. Taft. Among its members, as I recall, is Judge Parker, a Democrat of the strictest sect. A number of other admirable gentlemen are members of this league, which has a short but a momentous platform.

"In discussing this matter, which I propose to do with some frankness, I may say in the beginning that I am not indulging in a partisan discussion, and, furthermore, I speak with great respect for the gentlemen who make up the membership of the league. With the president of the league a Republican, and with an agreement between the president of the league and the President of the United States upon this matter, I think we may assume that it is a nonpartisan question and discuss it from that standpoint.

"I call attention to the platform of this league, for in the background of this discussion is this movement, the fountain source of this whole scheme:

"It is desirable for the United States to join a league of nations binding the signatories to the following:

"First. All justiciable questions arising between the signatory powers not settled by negotiation shall, subject to the limitation of treaties, be submitted to a judicial tribunal for hearing and judgment, both upon the merits and upon any issue as to its jurisdiction of the question.

"Second. All other questions arising between the signatories and not settled by negotiation shall be submitted to a council of conciliation for hearing, consideration, and recommendation.

"Third. The signatory powers shall jointly use forthwith both their economic and military forces against any one of their number that goes to war or commits acts of hostility against another of the signatories before any question arising shall be submitted as provided in the foregoing.

"This is a proposal, as you see, to form a league composed of the nations of the earth, if they all saw fit to join it—the nations of Europe and the nations of America and of the Orient—by which all matters of dispute, justiciable or otherwise, shall be submitted either to an international tribunal or a council of conciliation, and behind it all is the pledge, through treaties or otherwise, to use the economic and military forces of the nations to enforce a recognition or a compliance with the terms of the alliance. We would be one member of that league. We would have a single voice in the determination of the issues, as to the nature of them, and so forth, and the central idea of the entire movement is the use of force ultimately in the settlement of any disputes which might arise.

"The President, speaking before this League to Enforce Peace, with its platform as its creed, used this language, after discussing the desire of the nations to get together:

"So sincerely do we believe in these things that I am sure that I speak the mind and the wish of the people of America when I say that the United States is willing to become a partner in any feasible association of nations formed in order to realize these objects—

"To wit, the objects outlined and described in the League to Enforce Peace—

"and make them secure against violation.

* * * * * * *

"Here is a clear and unmistakable declaration to the effect that the United States is willing to become a partner, a term of wide-reaching significance, in any association of nations, European and oriental, to insure or enforce peace, to use our economic and military forces to compel all nations members of the league to submit their affairs to these tribunals, and if any fail to do so to make war upon them. But that is not the worst of it. We agree in advance to authorize other nations to make war upon the United States if we refuse to submit some vital issue of ours to the decision of some European or Asiatic nations. This approaches, to my mind, moral treason.

"A universal association of the nations to maintain the inviolate security of the highway of the seas for the common and unhindered use of all the nations of the world and to prevent any war, begun either contrary to treaty covenants or without warning, and full submission of the causes to the opinion of the world—a virtual guaranty of territorial integrity and political independence.

"'Territorial integrity' and 'political independence'! Now, read this paragraph in connection with the paragraph in the note and in connection with Mr. Lansing's statement and the platform of the league, under whose auspices the President was speaking, and there is nothing left to doubt. I hope the nations will understand that if they shall expect us to enter into such a program that there are some who will have to be consulted more fully before that step is taken, and that is the people upon whom will rest the burden and with whom will rest the sacrifices involved in carrying out this new and startling program.

"Senators, let us proceed further; what is the meaning of that language? When we agree to enter into an alliance which proposes by means of the military and naval forces of the United States to protect the national integrity of every small nation of Europe we have gone to the storm center of European politics. We have abandoned the policy of nearly a century and a half and entered directly and at once upon that policy which was condemned by the Father of our Country in the very beginning of the Government.

"I do not complain that the President entertains these views, and, as I said a few moments ago, had they been contained in a note which bound the President alone it would have been my duty to refrain even from a discussion of them at this critical juncture. But when the note is thrown into the Senate with what in my judgment is a complete reiteration in briefer style but just as comprehensive as his statement upon repeated occasions that he is in favor of this Nation entering into an alliance with the nations of the earth to use its military and naval forces to enforce peace, I am placed in a position then that if as a Member of the body I should vote for the resolution I would undoubtedly indorse the policy, something no exigency could induce me to do. I want peace. I share that sentiment with all my countrymen. I would hesitate to stand against the Chief Executive in any move which he would make in regard to it. But rather than see my country enter upon that course which, in my humble judgment, is not to promote peace but to promote war, I would oppose it at whatever cost to the cause of peace in Europe. I will not seem to court peace and instead and in fact court war. I do not know, Mr. President, how universal the sentiment is. We are told it has become practically the sentiment of the American people. I propose for my part to reflect and to repent before we start upon such a course and not afterwards.

"The Senator from Illinois, Mr. Lewis, said there was nothing in this language which should lead us to the conclusion of the abandonment of the Monroe doctrine. If the language of the President in the note, taken in connection with his speech before the league to enforce peace, and in connection with the platform which he indorsed by his language, is to be accepted, let us see whether or not it would destroy or abrogate, as it were, the Monroe doctrine.

"Suppose the United States and Argentina and Brazil and some of the nations of Europe enter into an alliance of this nature; suppose that Argentina and one of the Governments of Europe are unable to agree to some matter in dispute. Argentina, considering the matter vital, refuses to submit her dispute to an international tribunal or to a council of conciliation; under this doctrine of the league to enforce peace we would not only have agreed that the European nations could come here and engage in war with Argentina, but if we were called upon we would have to join our Army and Navy to enforce the matter against Argentina. We would join the European nation against our sister American Republic. It is an invitation for Europe to come to America to participate in our affairs and to be a part and parcel of American affairs as completely as European affairs. In fact, there would be no American affairs in the practical operation of the league, for Europe and the Orient would always control the court.

"It means, therefore, Mr. President, not only the abandonment of the doctrine of no entangling alliances established by Washington, but it means the abandonment of the Monroe doctrine, announced by Monroe upon the mature advice of Jefferson.

"Let us see; take some illustrations which may show the dangerous course upon which we are about to enter if we indorse such a policy. I am going to use the names of some of the nations, in order not to deal too abstractly, although in doing so, of course, I am not to be considered as using them because I either fear them or would offend them, but simply as an illustration.

"We will assume now that the partnership of which the President spoke has been formed, that the cooperation has been completed, and the combine and alliance has been made, and in that combination and alliance are Japan and Russia and the United States. We will assume that after the combination is made Russia and Japan have a dispute as to their rights in Manchuria. Japan insists that it should be submitted to the arbitral tribunal. Russia insists that it involves her vital interests and refuses to submit it, and moves her troops immediately to the disputed territory. Under the league alliance which we have formed and the treaties which we have made we must join with Japan in punishing Russia for refusing to submit her proposition to the tribunal. Regardless of whether it was Russia or Japan, would we brave our way across the ocean to shed a nation's blood in a war in which we had only the most general concern? Where do these gentlemen expect to get their soldiers or sailors for such expeditions?

"I am afraid that these gentlemen who talk about a league to enforce peace have overlooked in their zeal the fact that this is still a government of the people, by the people, and for the people, and that they make war, make and unmake administrations, make and unmake Congresses, and they would have to be consulted. You might force through your combination—that could be done in the comfortable chambers of courts—but the men who made these treaties would not be the ones to die for them. The people would have to do the fighting, and, fortunately, they also do the voting.

"Let us take another illustration. We will assume that Mexico has been restored to law and order and has an established government; that Mexico is a member of the alliance; that Japan is a member of the alliance; and that Mexico conceives the idea of leasing Magdalena Bay to Japan for 99 years, and we protest against it. We have already joined the alliance. They also are members of it. Mexico says, 'Certainly I have a right to dispose of my territory'; and Japan says, 'I have a right to lease.' We are all members of a common league bound together for a common purpose. Would the United States submit that question to a tribunal where it has but one vote or one voice and permit its entire future to be disposed of by a court where it has but a single representative and probably no friend, so far as that question would be concerned?

"If these words which I have quoted, Mr. President, lead us in this direction, we are approaching the most important subject with which we could deal with reference to foreign affairs. I have already called attention to the platform of the League to Enforce Peace. I want to call attention now to the language of Sir Edward Grey a few days ago in regard to the same subject matter. He says:

"Only bear this in mind—

"Speaking to those who were in favor of a league to enforce peace—

"if the nations in the world after the war are to do something more effective than they have been able to do before, to bind themselves together for the common object of peace, they must be prepared not to undertake more than they are prepared to uphold by force, and to see when the time of crisis comes that it is upheld by force. In other words, we say to neutrals who are occupying themselves with this question that we are in favor of it. But we shall have to ask when the time comes for them to make any demand on us for such a thing, 'Will you play up when the time comes?' It is not merely a sign manual of sovereigns or presidents that is required to make a thing like that worth while; it must also have behind it parliaments and national sentiment.

"In other words, Mr. President, this has already in the estimation of these gentlemen passed beyond the domain of mere theory or of didactic discussion, that it is now a practical question of how far the United States is willing to go; and, as Sir Edward Grey says, we must understand that it means force in the enforcement of terms and conditions upon which the league exists. No mere words, no sentimentality about the millennium, but force is the dominant note and war will be the ultimate result. Is this what our President meant a few weeks ago when he said this is the last European war in which we will not take a part?

"We are now proposing to pass legislation which will commit this body to the proposition that we are in favor of entering such an alliance, an alliance controlled and dominated by the element of force in matters of peace.

"Mr. President, Prof. Lowell, in an article in the last North American Review, says:

"Many Americans complain that the league would involve our country in entangling alliances with foreign nations contrary to our traditions. It would certainly involve obligations, and those of a very grave character—obligations that might possibly result in war—and so does the Monroe doctrine.

"The learned professor is frank, but with all his learning, with his great knowledge of history, I would have expected him to say 'probably' result in war instead of 'possibly' result in war. Before Washington committed us to the doctrine of 'nonentangling alliances' America took part in all European wars. Had not it been for Washington's policy, had he yielded in the fateful hour when urged to form a European alliance, we would have participated in every war which has torn and tormented Europe from that hour to this.

"It is this feature of this resolution covering this particular language of the act which makes it impossible for me to support the resolution. Now, I should like to ask the Members who are supporting the resolution if they understand that the Senate of the United States is about to indorse the idea contained in this language? I should like to ask, I say, the Senators supporting this resolution if they understand that we are about to indorse a proposition contained in this language, to wit, that we are willing to enter into association or any form of cooperation for the purpose of protecting the small nations of Europe?

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not understand the Senator addresses his remarks particularly to me, but I am frank to say that, as far as I am personally concerned, I aimed in the resolution to indorse nothing except the request made by the President on the warring nations to state the terms upon which peace might be considered.

"Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator, since he is on the floor, if he understands this language to mean that the United States is willing to enter into an alliance to cooperate with the nations of Europe for the purpose of protecting the small nations of Europe?

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; it does not.

"Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator from Idaho yield just a moment?

"The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PITTMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Georgia?

"Mr. BORAH. I yield.

"Mr. HARDWICK. Has the language been modified on that point so as to exclude that?

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; my resolution still stands as originally presented. There have been presented a number of proposed changes as amendments. I have not as yet accepted anything.

"Mr. BORAH. Then I ask the Senator what the construction is of the language of the note where it says:

"Their interest—

"Referring to the Government of the United States—

"Their interest, moreover, in the means to be adopted to relieve the smaller and weaker peoples of the world of the peril of wrong and violence is as quick and ardent as that of any other people or Government. They stand ready, and even eager, to cooperate in the accomplishment of these ends, when the war is over, with every influence and resource at their command.

"Now, one of the resources is to enter into treaties for that purpose and to use the Army and Navy to that end.

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. I might not differ so much with the Senator from Idaho upon the construction which he places upon the note. The point I make is that the time when the Senate is to take a position upon any proposition of that sort will not arrive until it is proposed by the President or reaches the Senate in the form of a treaty.

"Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we may adopt a policy and carry it out afterwards by treaty, but so far as announcing the attitude of this Government toward the proposition, so far as announcing its policy, if that is the meaning of the President's note and the Congress adopts it, would it not be, so far as the adoption of the policy is concerned, conclusive upon that proposition?

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I trust the Senator will not insist that my resolution indorses the President's note. I have endeavored to make it plain, in what I have said, that I aim at least in the resolution to indorse nothing except the President's request to the warring nations to state the terms upon which peace might be considered, and in my opening remarks I distinctly disavowed any desire to commit the Senate to an indorsement of anything which might be controversial or argumentative.

"Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

"The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Illinois?

"Mr. BORAH. I do.

"Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, assuming that the Senator from Idaho likewise addresses his query to me, in view of my observations on that subject, I desire to ask the Senator in turn, to form a reply to the query, Does he assume that the President of the United States by the use of the expression 'using the resources at our command' means that he would do anything or attempt to do anything until commanded by the people, and does he assume that the people, through their representatives, would ever command anything in violation of the institutions of America?

"Mr. BORAH. Well, it would not be in violation of the institutions of America if we should adopt the policy, though I think it would be an exceedingly unwise policy; but there is nothing in our institutions or Constitution or anything else which would prevent us from doing so if we desired to do it in a proper way.

"Mr. LEWIS. Might I be pardoned if I asked the Senator if he would not regard the Monroe doctrine and what it means as one of the fixed institutions of the political policy of America?

"Mr. BORAH. Yes; but it is one that we could abandon if we desired to do so. We announced and we can renounce it. It rests alone with the United States.

"Mr. LEWIS. We could likewise, may I suggest to the Senator, abandon the Constitution if we chose and violate it.

"Mr. BORAH. Let me call the Senator's attention to the language of the President. It seems that the President has already consulted with the people in this matter, and he feels that the people have authorized him to act in the matter; and that being true, there is nothing to hinder him from proceeding, according even to the terms of the Senator from Illinois. The President says:

"So sincerely do we believe in these things that I am sure that I speak the mind and wish of the people of America—

"When that was ascertained I have no means of knowing—

"when I say that the United States is willing to become a partner in any feasible association of nations formed in order to realize these objects—

"What objects? The objects covered by the platform of the League to Enforce Peace, before which he was speaking—

"and make them secure against violation.

"He has already, in his judgment, had the views of the people, and feels that in entering into this partnership, this association of nations, for the purpose of enforcing peace, he is carrying out the will and purpose of the people of the United States. It may be true that that is the will and the purpose of the people of the United States; I do not know; but I know that it is not my will, and never could be. Again, the President says:

"I am sure that the people of the United States would wish their Government to move along these lines:

"That is to say, carrying out his statement—

"A universal association of the nations to maintain the inviolate security of the highway of the seas for the common and unhindered use of all the nations of the world, and to prevent any war, begun either contrary to treaty covenants or without warning, and full submission of the causes to the opinion of the world—a virtual guaranty of territorial integrity and political independence.

"In other words, we are ready to enter into a combination to guarantee the territorial integrity of Serbia, of Roumania, and of every other small nation of Europe that may be involved in a controversy in the future.

"Now, my friends upon the other side, if you desire to meet the issue fairly and squarely, you will do so by eliminating in an unmistakable way from the resolution any possible approval of that proposition. Or if you are in favor of it, if it is the position of the majority party in the Senate that they want to enter into this league, this partnership, then we are ready to meet that issue. I insist the question is plainly here, and I do not propose that it shall be put aside. I want you to take the responsibility or renounce it.

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

"Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. In my opinion and my understanding of the English language, no change is necessary; but the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] has proposed an amendment to my resolution, and I should like to inquire whether that amendment would meet the views of the Senator from Idaho? The resolution, as the Senator from Washington proposes to amend it, would then read as follows:

"Resolved, That the Senate approves and strongly indorses the request by the President in the diplomatic notes of December 18 to the nations now engaged in war that those nations state the terms upon which peace might be discussed.

"That is exactly the proposition that I wanted to put before the Senate. I think the meaning of my resolution is not essentially changed by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington, and I should like to know from the Senator from Idaho whether the adoption of that amendment would obviate the objection which he finds to my resolution?

"Mr. BORAH. I think the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington is entirely a different proposition from the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska, and if the Senator from Nebraska is willing to adopt the resolution of the Senator from Washington I shall conclude my remarks at once.

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, Mr. President, if such action on my part would conclude this discussion, or even shorten the discussion, I should be glad to take it. I will say now that I will accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington, so far as I am concerned.

"Mr. BORAH. Do I understand that the amendment of the Senator from Washington is accepted by the Senator from Nebraska?

"The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the understanding of the Chair.

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have the right to accept that amendment, I believe, under the parliamentary situation, and I accept it.

"Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

"The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

"Mr. BORAH. I yield for a question.

"Mr. NORRIS. I should like to say that, while I have an amendment which I have offered to the resolution, if my colleague will adopt the language as proposed by the Senator from Washington, I shall be glad to withdraw my suggested amendment and support the resolution in that form. It contains the same idea that I was trying to reach with my amendment, and, so far as I am concerned, in that form I am ready to vote for it.

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. I accept the amendment, Mr. President.

"The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska modifies his amendment by the acceptance of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

"Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I stated to the Senator from Nebraska that, so far as I was concerned, I should terminate my remarks upon the acceptance by him of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington. I want to add this, however, in a brief way: In voting for the substitute which has been accepted there is language in the President's note with which I do not agree; but it is such that I should not permit it to stand in the way of any supposed aid that the passage of the resolution in its present shape might be to the cause of peace. I would not permit it to stand in the way of my assisting that movement. I do not want to be understood, however, in casting my vote for the resolution as approving anything in the note except the request for terms."

THE MOONEY CASE.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I read in the papers yesterday that John B. Densmore, special agent of the Department of Labor, had given to the House of Representatives a statement of a report which he made to the Department of Labor on the Mooney trial in San Francisco. Having read in the press that the Secretary of Labor had stated before the American Federation of Labor at its last meeting, at Atlantic City, that the trial had been a fair trial, I was rather surprised that his subordinate should have again precipitated this discussion; and I sent to the department for a copy, if it were available, of the speech of the Secretary of Labor, which he kindly sent me. I ask that that part of it referring to the Mooney trial be printed in the RECORD, unless the Senate desires to hear it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that the whole speech has been printed in the RECORD at the request of the Vice President. I can not tell the Senator the exact page, but it is in there already—not only the part that he asks to have printed now, but every word that the Secretary of Labor said at that meeting.

Mr. PHELAN. As long as I am on my feet, I will read just three or four lines, because there seems to be an attempt, judging by editorial comment in the New York press, to reflect upon the courts of California, and therefore, to refresh the minds of those who are not familiar with the speech of the Secretary, I will read these few words.

The Secretary of Labor says:

You may accept it or leave it, as your own judgment tells you is best. I have been very much interested in the Mooney case. I was requested by the President, when his commission went West, to look into the Mooney case and report to him. We looked into the Mooney case, and in doing so we came to this conclusion: That so far as the jury was concerned that passed upon the evidence presented to it, it could have come to no other conclusion under its sworn duty than to convict Mooney; that so far as the judge was concerned who tried the case, he tried it with absolute fairness.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator desires to put in any further part of the speech as a part of his remarks I shall not object. Let the Senator mark just which part he wants published.

Mr. PHELAN. I think it will be more satisfactory to put it in as the Secretary delivered it. So I will ask that it be inserted in the RECORD as marked by me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

May I, also, Mr. President, take this opportunity of giving a word of advice in connection with another situation that has been tense throughout the country? The advice is given freely, honestly, and earnestly. You may accept it or leave it as your own judgment tells you is best. I have been very much interested in the Mooney case. I was requested by the President, when his commission went West, to look into the Mooney case and report to him. We looked into the Mooney case, and in doing so we came to this conclusion: That so far as the jury was concerned that passed upon the evidence presented to it, it could have come to no other conclusion under its sworn duty than to convict Mooney; that so far as the judge was concerned who tried the case, he tried it with absolute fairness. But there were some things existing in addition to that. At the time of the trial certain evidence had been given by certain individuals relative to the supposed activities of Mooney. It afterwards developed that one of the principal witnesses had written to a friend of his in Illinois asking him to come to San Francisco and be prepared to testify that he had seen Oxman, the witness, at a given point at a given time, so as to testify to the possibility of Oxman's being at the point where he claimed to have secured the evidence. The commission was of the opinion that in view of that change in the evidence, and in view of other changes that had taken place in the evidence from the date of trial, Mooney ought to be given a new trial, and his innocence or guilt decided upon the evidence as it existed when this new evidence was produced.

At that time I had no fixed opinions as to either the guilt or the innocence of Mooney. With me it was not a question of whether Mooney was guilty or was innocent, but a question of securing a fair trial for him under the existing circumstances. Every effort that the national administration was able to put forth was put forth for the purpose of trying to secure that new trial, and we are not through with it yet. We are still working on it.

But that is not the phase of the situation that I particularly wanted to advise you about. I am simply stating these facts as premilinary to what is to follow. There has been carried on throughout the country a nation-wide agitation for a universal strike as a protest against the conviction of Mooney. My friends, do you realize just what that action means to the masses of the people? Do you understand fully—most of you do—the struggle that has taken place in order that trials may take place by jury where people are accused, with the accused having the opportunity of meeting the witnesses and the jury face to face, and the jury having opportunity of witnessing the manner in which the witnesses give their testimony? That change, the establishment of the jury system, was not brought about for the purpose of protecting the monarch or protecting the nobility. It has not been principally essential for the protection of men of great wealth; they have usually been in a position to protect themselves. The jury system was brought into existence for the purpose of protecting poor fellows like you and me from the power and influence of the other fellow.

It may occasionally miscarry; occasionally an injustice or a wrong may be done, but in the great bulk of cases justice is meted out through the jury system. Neither you nor I nor anyone in the labor movement, no one who belongs to the great masses of our people, can afford to undertake to try Mooney by the process of a strike. If he is to be tried, he should be tried by a jury that can meet him face to face and meet the witnesses face to face and be able to digest the evidence as it comes out, bit by bit. Very few of us have had an opportunity of examining the evidence in the Mooney case; very few of us know anything more about the Mooney case than simply that which is connected with Oxman, one of the principal witnesses; and yet it is proposed that every workingman in the country, whether he has information concerning the Mooney case or not, shall become a juror in this case and at the same time that he becomes a juror shall enter into a strike to bring about a decision. What influence will it have? The man who under our laws can pardon him or liberate him from prison is not under the jurisdiction of the voters of any other part of the country than that of California; and I do not know but that, even though there may be a miscarriage of justice occasionally, it is a wise thing that that is the case. The further you get the responsible officers removed from the electorate, the less influence the electorate has with those responsible officers; and while the responsible officers may occasionally pursue a course that is not acceptable to the multitude, it is better that they should be close to the multitude, close to the electorate, than that they should be far removed, as would be the case if the responsibility rested with the Federal official instead of with the State or local official.

My friends, we in this country have been moving on by the evolutionary processes, taking hold of the problems that confront us, holding fast to that which experience demonstrates to be good, letting loose of those things which experience demonstrates to be bad. It is the safest method, the surest method. Revolutionary processes may move us forward rapidly for a brief period. On the other hand, the chances are that when a revolution takes place no one will be able to determine where it will end. That has been true of nearly all the revolutions of the world, and the policy that has been pursued by the American labor movement of going forward by evolutionary processes, making sure of each foothold with every step that it takes, so that there will be no step backward, is the surest and best process for the achievement of the highest ideals of mankind. I thank you.

PROPAGANDA ON PACKING INDUSTRY.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I ask to have read the telegram which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the telegram will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

VALDOSTA, GA., July 24, 1919.

Hon. W. J. HARRIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Representative of Armour & Co., using prepared pamphlets and propaganda, appeared before chamber of commerce asking resolution of chamber to request your influence in defeating Kenyon bill. Chamber obtained copy of proposed measure and has indorsed same in open meeting. President of chamber was directed to wire our Senators, asking that they heartily support bill and aid in prompt passage. This to you as information, in order that you may know the real sentimcnt. We hope you will use every effort toward early passage of bill.

THE A. S. PENDLETON CO.
VALDOSTA GROCERY CO.
CURRY GROCERY CO.
H. F. TILLMAN GROCERY CO.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, July 28, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 25, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Great Spirit, above all, through all, and in us all, help us to be somebody, to do some things which shall add to the sum of human happiness, and thus prove ourselves worthy sons of the living God.

Strong Son of God, immortal love,
Whom we, that have not seen Thy face,
By faith, and faith alone, embrace,
Believing where we can not prove.

Thou seemest human and divine,
The highest, holiest manhood, Thou:
Our wills are ours, we know not how,
Our wills are ours, to make them Thine.

To strengthen, uphold, sustain, and guide us on our way to the life immortal. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HOWARD, for the remainder of the week, on account of attending the christening of the ship City of Tulsa.

To Mr. LONERGAN, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. MILLER, for one day, on account of illness.

To Mr. JONES of Texas, for two days, on account of important business.

To Mr. MANSFIELD, for two days, on account of important business.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that yesterday they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

H. R. 7413. An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, announced that the President had approved and signed joint resolution and bill of the following titles:

H. J. Res. 73. Joint resolution authorizing the President to extend invitations to other nations to send representatives to the World Cotton Conference to be held at New Orleans, La., October 13 to 16, inclusive; and

H. R. 7413. An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

PATRIOTIC ACTIVITIES OF TULSA, OKLA.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes on the subject of the patriotic activities of communities in my district.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I have just taken occasion to obtain leave of absence from attendance here for the balance of the week so that I may attend to-morrow the launching in Philadelphia of the ship City of Tulsa, which is to be a part of our merchant marine and which is named for my home city. In connection with that I want to say that, of course, we all understand that none of our citizens participated in the recent war for the purpose of being lauded for their accomplishments, but did so because of patriotism and love of country.

However, I feel that it is not amiss to call your attention for a moment to the fact that this week, in recognition of the patriotic work done during the conflict that has just ended, there are being christened two ships, to become a part of our great merchant marine, named in honor of cities in my district. The good ship Vinita is being launched out in the Pacific, and to-morrow at Hog Island will be launched the good ship City of Tulsa. This ship is named in honor of my home town, a city of only 10 years, with a population of 60,000. But her record during the war is amazing. Her patriotic citizens subscribed $31,371,760 to Liberty loans; $465,500 to Red Cross; $196,000 to war budgets; $1,750,000 in war-savings stamps; $60,000 to Jews of that city; $18,500 to Knights of Columbus; $310,000 to war-work fund; $10,000 to armory fund; $15,000 to military organizations, Navy League, and ambulance and hospital funds; furnished 7,500 soldiers; and organized and put in the service three independent military units. [Applause.]

This, I feel, is a record to be proud of, and nowhere in this country do I believe is a community or city of this size that has done more to bring to a successful close the war just ended than have the cities of Vinita and Tulsa. And to me it will be a great moment when on to-morrow I see one of Oklahoma's most accomplished young ladies, Miss Lulu Crosbie, break a bottle of crude oil, Oklahoma's greatest natural product, over the bow of that ship and watch the City of Tulsa glide into the water, and know that the great State of Oklahoma did its full duty, and that these honors have been conferred upon the citizens of my district and town for their patriotism and assistance to our Government during the crisis that has just passed. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to Senate concurrent resolution 5:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 50,000 copies of the treaty with Germany in the English text alone and without maps, 10,000 of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives and 40,000 for the use of the Senate.

The amendments are as follows: Line 2, strike out "fifty" and insert "sixty," and in line 4 strike out "ten" and insert "twenty."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, joint resolution of the following title:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 147) to ratify and confirm from and including July 1, 1919, obligations incurred pursuant to the terms of certain appropriations for the fiscal year 1920.

THE FAR EAST BILL.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes on the Far East bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes on the Far East bill. Is there objection?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I suggest the absence of a quorum. I make this point because it seems impossible by any other means to get anything on this question before the House.

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I did not understand the purpose of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], and I withdraw my objection so that he may address the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraws his objection. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] withdraw the point of no quorum?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order to suggest that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has already spoken about five minutes?

The SPEAKER. It would not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Texas is entirely off his feed. The gentleman has not been watching the proceedings.

Mr. Speaker, the controversy on this bill has reached that point where gentlemen have inquired why two Members of Congress from Pennsylvania should contend. There is nothing personal between the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] and myself on this subject. Mr. GRAHAM is ardently for this bill and I am against it. That is the difference. I see no reason why I should yield to him on this bill simply because it was proposed by a Representative from my State any more than I should yield on any other proposition with which I did not agree; and if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] had not applied the gag rule in this instance—and where he acquired the habit I do not know; certainly not in Pennsylvania, where such a thing is unknown—there might not have been such a contest as we have had on this bill. The truth of the matter is that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] has been induced to take over a Democratic measure which was introduced here by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE], and which was twice objected to by gentlemen on that side of the House—first by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] and second by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], who has been, I believe, conscientiously and consistently opposed to national incorporations.

I am opposed to this bill because I do not believe Congress should lightly at the end of a session, without discussion on this floor—there has been no discussion of this bill, and under the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] there can be none, except such as may be obtained by unanimous consent—I say Congress should not lightly pass these national incorporation bills in this way. True, Congress has passed some such bills, but I want my friends on both sides of the aisle to know that we have refused this high privilege of a national charter to the members of the Grand Army of the Republic, and in the last session of Congress we refused the national-charter privilege to the mothers of the American soldiers in the European war, women who wanted to help the boys of America.

Mr. KNUTSON. And to the Spanish War Veterans.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want that understood before you vote on this bill, and I want you to know, my friends, that what you are doing now is to incorporate a group of men, mostly from the city of New York, men whose names as philanthropists may be household words in New York, and who may be contributors to philanthropic movements elsewhere, and who may by this incorporation be relieved from taxation on certain charitable contributions as provided in the revenue law. I want you to know these gentlemen—some of them millionaires in New York—have come in where you refused a national charter to the Grand Army of the Republic and to mothers of soldiers of the Union, to do what? To dispense funds which were contributed by the good people of this country during the European war for the purposes of a war chest, for the purpose of the Red Cross, and for other patriotic purposes, presumably for the benefit of American soldiers. And where did the money come from? From New York exclusively? Nay, nay; it came from every State in the Union.

By some means they have succeeded in raising approximately $30,000,000, contributed from the Red Cross, the war chests, and so forth, from practically every State in the Union—Arkansas, Wisconsin, Maine, Pennsylvania, California, Idaho, Texas—and they or their appointees are to go over yonder under this national charter to reestablish the people of Armenia and Turkey and spend this money which might very readily be applied to soldiers or their dependents here. In the name of the Congress of the United States they are to use this $30,000,000 and as much more as they can collect, mixing up in European affairs, assisting in the work of reconstruction there, apart from the needs of the soldiers of the United States and the families and dependents of the soldiers of the United States. The incorporators include a few very conspicuous Democrats and a few versatile Republicans, whose names sound good in the community, and it will be up to the officers and employees appointed by them to speak for the Congress of the United States, probably in conformity with the general idea recently thrown out from New York that we are to advance a billion dollars to reestablish credits in foreign countries and put Europe on its feet. We have such philanthropic and financial problems of our own——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So there is good reason for opposing the bill, Mr. Speaker, and I wanted to get this five minutes, though I would like to have had fifty, to prevent its going through by default. Let the governor of each State name the members of this committee and I might agree to the proposition. It would then at least be national in scope. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business before the House is the Senate bill (S. 180) to incorporate Near East Relief. The House had reached the stage of ordering the bill to a third reading.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I rise for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to speak for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to speak for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] makes the same request.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if he will give me five minutes?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. That is not in my power.

Mr. BEGG. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The question is on ordering the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRAMTON. I would like to ask whether, this being pension day in the House, it would be in order at this time for the chairman of either of the Pension Committees or a member of one of the committees or any Member of this House to move now to go into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of pension bills?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The unfinished business is in order.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. CRAMTON. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report back forthwith the substitute which I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CRAMTON moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to that committee to report the same back forthwith with the following substitute:

"Be it enacted, etc., That the persons named, as hereinafter provided, and their successors duly chosen, are hereby incorporated and declared to be a body corporate of the District of Columbia by the name of Near East Relief, and by that name shall be known and have perpetual succession, with the powers, limitations, and restrictions herein contained.

"SEC. 2. The object for which said corporation is incorporated shall be to provide relief and to assist in the repatriation, rehabilitation, and reestablishment of suffering and dependent people of the Near East and adjacent areas.

"SEC. 3. The direction and management of the affairs of the corporation, and the control of its property and funds, shall be vested in a board of trustees, to be composed of 48 men and women, 1 from each of the States of the United States, to be appointed by the governor thereof for the term of two years and until their successors are chosen, who shall constitute the first board of trustees and constitute the members of the corporation. Vacancies occurring by death, resignation, or otherwise shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointments, and the persons so elected shall thereupon become trustees and also members of the corporation.

"SEC. 4. That the principal office of the corporation shall be located in the District of Columbia.

"SEC. 5. That the said trustees shall be entitled to take, hold, and administer any securities, funds, or property which may be transferred to them for the purposes and objects hereinbefore enumerated by the existing and unincorporated American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, and such other funds or property as may at any time be given, devised, or bequeathed to them or to such corporation, for the purposes of the trust; with full power from time to time to adopt a common seal, to appoint officers, whether members of the board of trustees or otherwise, and such employees as may be deemed necessary for carrying on the business of the corporation, and at such salaries or with such remuneration as they may think proper: Provided, That not more than three of said members shall be officers or employees with compensation at one time; and full power to adopt by-laws and such rules or regulations as may be necessary to secure the safe and convenient transaction of the business of the corporation.

SEC. 6. That as soon as may be possible after the passage of this act a meeting of the trustees hereinbefore named shall be called by Cleveland H. Dodge, Henry Morgenthau, Abram I. Elkus, Edwin M. Bulkley, Alexander J. Hemphill, William B. Millar, George T. Scott, James L. Barton, and Charles V. Vickrey, or any six of them, at the borough of Manhattan, in the city of New York, by notice served in person or by mail, addressed to each trustee at his place of residence; and the said trustees named herein, or a majority thereof, being assembled, shall organize and proceed to adopt by-laws, to elect officers, and generally to organize the said corporation.

SEC. 7. That a meeting of the incorporators, their associates, or successors shall be held once in every year after the year of incorporation at the principal office at such time as shall be prescribed in the by-laws, when the annual reports of the officers and executive boards shall be presented and members of the executive board elected for the ensuing year. Special meetings of the corporation may be called upon such notice as may be prescribed.

SEC. 8. That a copy of the constitution and by-laws and of all amendments thereto shall be filed with the Congress when adopted, and on or before the 1st day of April each year said corporation shall make and transmit to the Congress a report of its proceedings for the year ending December 31 preceding, including in such report the names and residences of its officers, and a full and itemized account of all receipts and expenditures: Provided, That such constitution, by-laws, and report shall not be printed at the expense of the Government and shall not be subject to the franking privilege.

SEC. 9. That the corporation shall have no power to issue certificates of stock or declare or pay any dividends, or otherwise distribute to its members any of its property, or the proceeds therefrom, or from its operations. On dissolution of the corporation the property shall escheat to the American Red Cross.

SEC. 10. That all members and officers of the corporation and of its governing body must be citizens of the United States.

SEC. 11. That the franchise herein granted shall terminate at the expiration of 10 years from the date of the approval of the act; and that Congress reserves the right to repeal, alter, or amend this act at any time.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CRAMTON. First, I ask for recognition, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman of course can not be recognized in debate, the previous question having been ordered.

Mr. CRAMTON. Upon the motion to recommit?

The SPEAKER. Certainly. The previous question is ordered upon the bill for final passage and no debate is allowed.

Mr. CRAMTON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to make a correction in the substitute which has been reported, to correct a matter which I inadvertently overlooked.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has that right.

Mr. CRAMTON. On page 5, in lieu of the names beginning with "Cleveland H. Dodge" in line 1, down to and including the words "New York" in line 5, I ask that that be stricken out, and in lieu of that insert "the Secretary of State of the United States."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CRAMTON: Page 5, line 1, after the word "by," strike out the names on line 1, all of lines 2, 3, and 4, and down to and including the words "New York" in line 5, page 5, and insert in lieu thereof the words: "The Secretary of State of the United States."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to recommit as modified.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BEGG. Has the previous question been ordered on the final passage of the bill?

The SPEAKER. It has been ordered on the bill up to the final passage.

Mr. BEGG. I do not so understand it, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 57.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of no quorum.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman withhold it in order that I may direct a parliamentary inquiry to the Chair?

Mr. MANN. No.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to withhold the point of no quorum.

Mr. CRAMTON. The previous question does not state that it refers to the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the motion to recommit will, as their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. The RECORD does not show that the previous question was ordered on the bill to final passage. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] simply said:

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

That would have been on the pending motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks when the previous question is ordered on a bill without stating specifically what it is moved to, it is intended to be moved to the passage of the bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. There was no motion to recommit before the House, and it could not have well applied to that motion unless it so expressly stated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it does hold. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 119, nays 167, answered "present" 4, not voting 139, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The motion to recommit is not agreed to. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks for the yeas and nays. Those in favor of taking this vote by the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Sixty-five gentlemen have risen—a sufficient number—and the yeas and nays are ordered. Those in favor of the passage of the bill will, when their names are called, answer "aye"; those opposed will answer "no." The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 154, nays 125, answered "present" 2, not voting 148, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the consent of the House to change a reference. A few days ago a letter from the Secretary of the Navy was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. The Chair thinks it should have gone to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. The Chair has consulted the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, who consents to that change of reference. Without objection, the Chair would like to refer it to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 147. Joint resolution to ratify and confirm, from and including July 1, 1919, obligations incurred pursuant to the terms of certain appropriations for the fiscal year 1920.

LEAVE TO REVISE AND EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise the remarks which I made on the prohibition-enforcement bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to revise the remarks he made on the prohibition-enforcement bill. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I do not think the gentleman has to get unanimous consent to revise his remarks. If he wants to extend them, he has to get consent.

Mr. RUCKER. Probably in revising my remarks I will extend them, in a sense, but I have no idea of covering any ground which I have not already covered in my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the same subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks on the same subject. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama makes the same request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend some remarks on the prohibition bill that passed the House the other day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the prohibition bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio makes the same request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—WICKERSHAM AGAINST SULZER.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Elections No. 3 and ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. What is the case?

Mr. SMALL. The case of Wickersham against Sulzer, from Alaska.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa submits a privileged report, which will be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The report is as follows:

Your Committee on Elections No. 3, having had under consideration House resolution 105, a resolution relative to the securing of evidence in the contested-election case of James Wickersham v. Charles A. Sulzer, Territory of Alaska, recommend that said resolution be amended in the following respects:

On page 1 of the printed resolution, amend by striking out, in line 9, the words "necessary additional," and by striking out, at the end of said line 9 and the beginning of line 10, the words "as near as may be."

On page 1, amend by adding, after the word "on," in line 12, the words "George B. Grigsby."

On page 1, amend by striking out, in lines 13 and 14, after the figure "3," the words "the candidate who is successful in said special election to" and by inserting in lieu thereof the words "said George B. Grigsby shall."

On page 2, line 4, amend by striking out the word "to" and insert in lieu thereof the word "shall."

On page 2, amend by adding, after the word "rebuttal," in line 5, the word "testimony."

On page 2, amend by striking out all of paragraph 5, which includes the figure "5," at the end of line 5, and all of lines 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10, down to and including the semicolon following the word "witnesses."

Also amend by renumbering the paragraphs accordingly.

On page 2, amend by adding, after the word "candidate," line 19, the words "said George B. Grigsby."

On page 3, amend by adding after the word "on," line 5, the words "said George B. Grigsby."

On page 3, amend by adding, after the word "which," in line 6, the words "said George B. Grigsby."

On page 3, amend by adding, after the word "either," in line 8, the word "of."

On page 3, amend by striking out the words "and required," in line 10.

On page 3, amend by striking out the word "said," in line 11, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "the."

On page 3, amend by striking out the words "in the manner provided herein," in line 20.

On page 3, amend by striking out, in line 22, the comma, after the word "cause," and insert in lieu thereof a period; and by striking out all after the word "cause," in said line 22, and by striking out all of lines 23, 24, 25, and lines 1 and 2, on page 4, down to and including the word "and," in said line 2.

On page 4, line 2, amend by inserting, before the word "the," in line 2, the figure "10" and by capitalizing the word "the."

The committee recommends that said resolution so amended do pass.

Mr. DOWELL. I wish to give notice that on Monday I will ask to have this report considered.

PENSIONS.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, this is the day on which private pension bills are in order, and I call up an omnibus pension bill, H. R. 7657.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman move to go into Committee of the Whole?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois calls up the bill (H. R. 7657) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, and asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, how much debate does the gentleman expect to have upon this measure? We are getting in the habit of jamming pension bills through without discussing them, or any consideration whatever.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. If the first reading of the bill is dispensed with, there will be opportunity for debate if anybody desires it.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman will not move the previous question?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. No.

The SPEAKER. In the House as in Committee of the Whole there will be no opportunity for general debate. The only debate will be under the five-minute rule. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The bill will now be read under the five-minute rule for amendment.

The name of Melissa E. Dickinson, widow of Solomon A. Dickinson, late of Company I, Sixth Regiment New York Volunteer Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $35 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, on page 41, line 4, I move to amend by striking out the word "he" and inserting the word "she."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. FULLER: Page 41, line 4, strike out the word "he" and insert the word "she."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of John W. Fisher, late of Company H, Eighty-sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, before we finish the bill I would like to call attention to some facts that I have been able to gather touching the influenza epidemic.

At the close of the campaign against that epidemic, if we can call it a campaign, there was an effort to make a special study looking to the possibility of finding the source of its origin, and also whether there was any specific remedy, such as the antitoxin treatment of other epidemics, and also as to the general spread of the contagious influence of the disease.

I have here some statements from the head of certain medical associations, also specific or individual statements from some of our famous bacteriologists and epidemiologists, which all point to the same facts—that is, that the disease will again return; that it will probably be more disastrous in its effects than before; and that its after effects, upon children especially, are very deleterious.

When the medical association met in its convention at Atlantic City recently they passed a series of resolutions, and I received a copy, as I presume every other Member of the House received one. I am sure every Member received a copy of this resolution. I wrote to the secretary of the association and stated that we were not influenced in Congress by resolutions passed, because they could very easily be gotten through any association upon any subject. But if he would specifically answer some questions that Congress would be interested in, I thought Congress would be willing to consider the problem as it faces the country. I therefore wrote him enumerating certain questions that I desired him, as a distinguished physician, to answer.

The first was, Will the epidemic again appear?

Second. Is its origin fairly well known? If not, the likelihood of definite information by research.

Third. What success in the discovery of an antitoxin?

Fourth. The possibility of collecting necessary information and its distribution among the people reducing the dangers of its spread and increasing the chances of recovery.

Fifth. The generally bad aftereffects of the disease.

Sixth. Economic loss to the country of the epidemic if it can be given.

I received a letter in reply, answering these questions seriatim, and I believe the Members of the House would be glad to hear the answers as he gave them, if I can have the time to read them.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, July 14, 1919.

Hon. SIMEON D. FESS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. FESS: I wish to thank you for your communication of July 11, making reference to the resolutions which I forwarded you on July 8, and which were passed at the last meeting of the American Medical Association, requesting the appropriation by Congress of $1,500,000 for investigation as to the cause and means of spread of influenza. I am pleased to note your interest in the subject and will take pains to supply the data covering the questions raised by you.

I propose to furnish you with more complete answers to the six questions propounded, if necessary, but as a preliminary statement please note the following:

(1) The epidemic will recur, for medical history will show that we have had a series of influenza or grip epidemics, the last of which proved to be of the most virulent type. There immediately occur to me those of 1867 and of 1889 to 1895. The Metropolitan Life has issued some very definite figures on this latter epidemic, covering millions of policyholders, which show an average increased mortality for the five years following of 40 per cent above the normal death rate. Any figures of economic loss should include the perhaps 40 per cent increased mortality that will occur in the next four or five years. I will ask Dr. Lee Frankel to supply you with these charts and figures.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio have five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. May I state to the committee that the chart was furnished me, and I should have it before you now, because it shows in a graphic way the progress of epidemics as applied to la grippe of 1889 to 1893. This chart showed that it had reached its height in Chicago in 1891. Its first appearance was in 1889, and it reached its height in Boston in 1893, and in New York City at the same time. I do not note any graphic information on that in the city of Philadelphia, although that is given as one of the places that the plague was very contagious. The chart indicated that the first appearance of a malady does not show its highest mortal effect, but it comes two or three years after its first appearance.

The facts referred to came from two sources. One is the insurance companies and the other the study that was made under the direction of the Public Health Service in connection with the Government. There is a belief in the medical world that the second and third years will show frightful results from the epidemic, if it be not successfully combated with a knowledge of its origin and also specific remedies to combat it.

As to the question of the effects in the first year, the doctor said that there were 500,000 deaths alone from this malady. That figure is six times the mortality of the Great War, so far as it affected our country. He reports that we can not estimate the economic effect of the loss. I have a statement from a gentleman in Des Moines, Iowa, in commenting on the feasibility of appropriating $1,500,000 to fight the disease, in which he calls attention to the plain fact that it would take more than a million and a half dollars to simply bury the 500,000 people who were sacrificed under this epidemic. No one would undertake to estimate the economic loss. It would go probably to billions of dollars and even in that case it would be merely an estimate.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. Do I understand the gentleman to say that it would take a million and a half dollars to bury 500,000 people? That would only be $3 each.

Mr. FESS. I am repeating this gentleman's statement, that it would take more than a million and a half to simply bury the dead. Of course, it would take a great deal more than that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FESS. I would like to have one minute more to make a final statement.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. I shall not take the five minutes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. In view of the fact that I have the five minutes granted to me I will be very glad to yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. While the gentleman is burying half a million dead, I think at least he would better correct those figures and make the cost $50,000,000, which would only be $100 for each victim, and I think that would not be sufficient.

Mr. FESS. The confusion arose because I made the statement that was given to me in a letter.

This is the final statement that I desire to make. There is little doubt but that this malady will again come upon us. If the experience of the series of maladies that have overrun our country be duplicated, as I fear they will be, we may expect terrific results in the next year or two from this influenza. They tell me there is no antitoxin that has yet been discovered to combat it. Dr. Pfeiffer thought he had discovered that it was due to what was called the influenza bacillus. That theory has been abandoned by the medical world, and to-day the medical world is very much concerned about what they may have to meet in the near future. I think it would be wise, rational expenditure of money for the Congress before recess to take a step to set in motion machinery, under the direction of the highest medical talent of America, to hunt out under research the origin of this difficulty, together with the application of some remedy that may be discovered. The bad after effects of the influenza are brought home to every Member of this House.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Did we not appropriate $100,000,000, part of which is still available, to do this work under the Public Health Service?

Mr. FESS. I am not certain about the facts in connection with that. It ought to be done, I am sure. The bad after effects of influenza are shown in children. Only recently I saw a little boy, bright as a dollar, going about on two crutches, with little hope that he will ever be any better, who only 18 months ago was the pride of a home. He is a son of a professor whom I know very well, and that is only one case in a thousand where the bad after effects in children seem to be persistent. I hope that if we do not have a sufficient fund and authority to make this research we will provide it. From an economic standpoint, to say nothing about a vital effect, it would be a wise expenditure of money. [Applause.] In this conviction I yesterday introduced the following resolution:

Whereas the recent influenza epidemic caused approximately 550,000 deaths in the United States; and

Whereas a large proportion of these deaths were produced by pneumonia and other complications; and

Whereas influenza, pneumonia, and allied diseases now cause approximately one-tenth of all the deaths in the United States; and

Whereas medical science is not yet in possession of complete data as to the cause, modes of transmission, prevention, and cure of this disease and its complications; and

Whereas the possession of this knowledge is of grave social and economic concern to the Nation: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That to enable the Public Health Service to investigate influenza and allied diseases in order to discover their causes and to prevent their spread, and for allotment of sums to universities, colleges, or other suitable research institutions, as in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury are qualified for scientific research, for the purpose of discovering their causes and methods of prevention, in accordance with the rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and including pay and allowances of regular and reserve commissioned medical and sanitary personnel, and for medical and hospital supplies, printing, clerical services, and rent in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, transportation, freight, and such other expenses as may be necessary, including the dissemination of such information to the public, there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,500,000, available until expended.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Treasury are authorized and directed, respectively, to utilize jointly the personnel and facilities of the Medical Department of the Army, the Medical Department of the Navy, and the Public Health Service, so far as possible, in the investigation of the causes and methods of prevention of influenza and allied diseases.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Sarah J. White, widow of William W. White, late of Company K, Fourteenth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $75 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving: Provided, That in the event of the death of Minnie E. White, helpless and dependent daughter of said William W. White, $20 of the additional pension herein granted shall cease and determine: Provided further, That in the event of the death of Alice O. White, helpless and dependent daughter of said William W. White, $20 of the additional pension herein granted shall cease and determine: And provided further, That in the event of the death of Sarah J. White the names of said Minnie E. White and Alice O. White shall both be placed on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, at the rate of $20 per month to each of them from an after the date of death of said Sarah J. White.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, in line 18, page 46, I move to strike out the word "an" and insert the word "and."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. FULLER of Illinois:

Line 18, page 46, strike out the word "an" and insert the word "and."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FULLER of Illinois, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 7775, an omnibus pension bill, and ask unanimous consent that the same may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee calls up the bill H. R. 7775, and asks unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, when was this bill reported?

Mr. SELLS. Reported on Wednesday.

Mr. WALSH. Well, it does not seem to be on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. WALSH. I assume that only applies, Mr. Speaker, to bills that are on the Union Calendar. This bill is on the Private Calendar. It makes a charge against the Treasury.

Mr. SELLS. The bill just considered was on the Private Calendar.

Mr. WALSH. I have no objection to its being considered in the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7775) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill for amendment.

During the consideration of the bill the Clerk read as follows:

The name of Rebecca Strouther, mother of Charles Strouther, late of Company G, Forty-ninth Regiment United States Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 13, add "in lieu of that she is now receiving."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman explain why that amendment is offered?

Mr. SELLS. That is an increase case, and those words are usual in case where an increase of pension is granted.

Mr. WALSH. How much is she now receiving?

Mr. SELLS. Twelve dollars, and it is increased to $20.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Elvira Hunter, widow of Nicholas Hunter, late of Company F, First Arkansas Mounted Gunners, War with Mexico, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Speaker, I offer another amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, lines 15 and 16, strike out "War with Mexico" and insert "Sabine disturbance, Indian War."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I could not hear the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. SELLS. It is merely an error as to the service of the soldier.

Mr. WALSH. Well, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SELLS. Yes.

Ms. WALSH. It is customary to carry in these omnibus pension bills pensions for injuries or death incurred in these Indian insurrections?

Mr. SELLS. The Committee on Pensions has jurisdiction over all claims arising out of the Indian service.

Mr. WALSH. And it is usual to carry them in these omnibus bills——

Mr. SELLS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. From the Committee on Pensions?

Mr. SELLS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. And that has been the practice heretofore in recent years?

Mr. SELLS. Since I have been a member of the committee—eight years.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Lewis M. Strain, late of Company C, Fifteenth Regiment United States Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Speaker, I offer another amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 5, add "in lieu of that he is now receiving."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SELLS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PRIVATE CALENDAR BILLS—COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to move to go into the Committee of the Whole House to consider bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on Claims, and, pending that, I ask unanimous consent that they be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] moves to go into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on Claims. Pending that, he asks that the bills be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. Did not the gentleman ask unanimous consent?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; and if granted, that would dispose of the other suggestion. I rose to make the motion and then preferred to put it in this way.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. I will.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman propose to consider the bills that are unobjected to or intend to take up the first bill and, if there is debate, to permit an hour's debate, and then take up the next one, or go on and run through the calendar?

Mr. LITTLE. I do not really know what are objected to.

Mr. WALSH. It is rather difficult to state. There are quite a number of bills added since I went through the list of them. There are two or three on the first page of the bill.

Mr. LITTLE. If the gentleman will indicate. The gentleman spoke of the Kettner bill, and I would agree to that, and then the bill on the next page——

Mr. WALSH. I just wanted to know what the gentleman's intentions were.

Mr. KITCHIN. I hope the gentlemen will speak a little louder.

Mr. WALSH. I was trying to ascertain if the gentleman was seeking to have these bills considered practically by unanimous consent, or whether he would take them up one at a time and permit debate in the House and then proceed to take up the next one.

Mr. LITTLE. My understanding is that the bills will come up and be read for amendment. There will be plenty of time for debate under the five-minute rule. I expect when anybody objects to a bill to see that he gets time to discuss it under the five-minute rule. I intend everybody shall have reasonable time to make any objections he wants.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to consider these bills reported from the Committee on Claims on the Private Calendar in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

SUSIE CURRIER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first bill on the Private Calendar.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 753) for the relief of Susie Currier.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Susie Currier, of Old Town, Me., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100, being full compensation for accident and injuries with resulting loss of time and expense while working as charwoman in the United States post office at Old Town, Me., December 14, 1914.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LITTLE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DELLA JAMES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3844) for the relief of Della James.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Della James, of Richmond County, Ga., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for herself and in behalf of her children, the sum of $60 per month for a period of 10 years, in full settlement of all claims against the United States for the loss by death of her husband, Alfred J. James, through the explosion of a certain shell used in target practice by the One hundred and seventh Field Artillery, Fifty-third Artillery Brigade,

Twenty-eighth Division, at Camp Hancock, near Augusta, Ga., on March 29, 1918, said compensation to be payable from and after March 29, 1918.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Add at the end of the bill:

"Provided, That the said money shall be applied to the support of the widow and the said children during their respective minorities, but if she again marries the entire amount thereafter shall be used by her for the benefit of the minor children, and if the mother dies the money shall be paid the oldest child for the minors."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Is there objection?

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the committee amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield me a few moments?

Mr. LITTLE. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, this bill is one to pay the widow of the owner of certain property down in Georgia who was killed by some shrapnel from a gunfire by people in the military forces of the United States in target practice. I desire to ask the gentleman why you make this payment of $60 per month for a period of 10 years to the widow and did not make it the same as if the man had been insured under the War Risk Bureau?

Mr. LITTLE. The trouble the committee had in mind was that such payments would probably lodge that estate in the probate court and there would be three or four lawyers mixed up in it, and by the time the probate fees and lawyers' fees were paid there would not be much left for the widow or the children. We endeavored to adopt a method by which the money would go to the widow for the benefit of the minors.

Mr. WALSH. Certainly an addition of $2.50 to the amount would not eliminate that.

Mr. LITTLE. Does the gentleman want to know why we added $2.50?

Mr. WALSH. Why do you pay her more than if this man had been a soldier and insured under the War Risk Bureau?

Mr. LITTLE. This bill was first presented as a claim for $10,000, and the Secretary of War recommended that this system be adopted, which greatly reduces the total. We have, it is true, raised it a couple of dollars a month; but I will say to the gentleman that this woman has nine children, and we did not think it would hurt any if she got $2 more a month than some widow who did not have any children.

Mr. WALSH. I am sure the gentleman does not consider measures on the Claims Committee in any such way as that, because the bills he has reported out show they are given more careful consideration and are based upon sounder reason than that would indicate. But what I am trying to ascertain is, why in this case, in making up the compensation—and it is probably a just case—in paying her for the loss of her husband you recompense her in a larger sum than if her husband had been in the Army?

Mr. VINSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. I yield.

Mr. VINSON. I wish to say that the compensation is a great deal less than the widow of a soldier would receive. Sixty dollars a month for 10 years would be only $7,200. So the total amount the widow receives is less. If you will examine the hearing you will see that the Secretary of War recommended she be given $10,000 for a period of 20 years, as provided for a widow of a soldier who was killed in line of battle, but the committee decided to give her $60 a month for a period of 10 years, which would amount to $7,200. Now, if the gentleman from Massachusetts will further yield, under the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, if her husband had been a soldier, she would be paid $57.50 a month for a period of 20 years, and at the expiration of that time it would make the total in the neighborhood of $13,000, including the interest that is provided for by the act. Under this bill she only gets $7,200.

Mr. LITTLE. We reduced the bill from $10,000 to $7,200.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I think before we consider these claims on the calendar further we ought to have a quorum, and I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. VINSON. Will the gentleman yield first?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and lay that motion on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum, and evidently there is not.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw the point, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. WALSH. It is too late now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is too late now; the call of the House is ordered. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Two hundred and thirty-four Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

The doors were opened.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MILLER, by unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. JOHNSON of Washington, was granted leave of absence, indefinitely, on account of continued illness.

PRIVATE CALENDAR BILLS.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the reading of the next bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next one.

CHARLES A. CAREY.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2452) for the relief of Charles A. Carey.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill for amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, before he does that will the gentleman from Kansas yield to me?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes. But the gentleman can speak under the five-minute rule. I understood we took this up under the five-minute rule. As I understood, Mr. Speaker, when this matter came up at the instance of the gentleman from Illinois from the Committee on Pensions, the Speaker held that in the House as upon going into Committee of the Whole House on these bills they would be taken up under the five-minute rule and everybody would be entitled to discuss them under that rule.

Mr. WALSH. Well, what is the situation before they are read for amendment under the five-minute rule?

Mr. LITTLE. The purpose, as I understand the rule, is to do away with general debate on the bill and give everybody an opportunity to discuss it under the five-minute rule.

Mr. WALSH. I wanted the gentleman to yield to me before the bill is read for amendment.

Mr. LITTLE. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAKER. I would like to know what are the proceedings going on over there?

Mr. WALSH. I will relieve the anxiety of the gentleman in a moment if I can get the attention of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE]. I would like to direct the attention of the gentleman from Kansas to one or two features of the pending measure. It is the case of a letter carrier who was injured by falling on some icy steps, and it is apparently the intention of the Committee on Claims to grant him some compensation just as if the accident had happened after the act of March 9, 1914, was approved.

Mr. LITTLE. That is the idea.

Mr. WALSH. Well, I think it is a bad idea. I did not think, with all due respect to the committee, that after we passed that compensation act a committee of the House would then take up cases that occurred prior to its enactment and attempt to bring them within the provisions of the act by special enactment. I have some hesitation, I may say, in opposing this measure from the fact that it is introduced by one of my colleagues, but I can not quite agree that if a Federal employee is injured upon private property by reason of falling on slippery steps or a slippery sidewalk, due to the accumulation of ice, the Federal Government ought by special act to provide compensation for him if it occurred before we passed the general law.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. Do I understand this is a bill for compensation for an accident that occurred prior to the passage of the general law?

Mr. WALSH. It is a bill to compensate a letter carrier for an accident which occurred prior to the passage of the act of March 9, 1914.

Mr. CANNON. If you can go back of that, why not pass a general act going back to the foundation of the Government?

Mr. WALSH. Of course, in enacting this we establish a precedent that men who received injuries prior to the enactment of the act of March 9, 1914, may by special act be brought within the provisions of that law. I doubt the wisdom of embarking upon that kind of legislation. I therefore trust that this bill will not be passed.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LITTLE. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that he will find upon the Claims Calendar—not before the House, but the Claims Committee—numerous such bills, which seek to go behind the general act, and the passage of this bill is going to establish a precedent for the allowance of numerous such bills. I am heartily in favor of the proposition as asserted by the gentleman from Massachusetts, that we either pass a general law taking them all in or we ought not to go behind the general act.

Mr. WALSH. Well, Mr. Speaker, that is in line with the suggestion of the Postmaster General because in his letter of April 24, 1916, he says:

> You request my opinion as to the merits of the proposed bill for the relief of Mr. Carey. It is the opinion of the department that favorable consideration should not be given to bills for the relief of particular letter carriers injured in line of duty, but that if relief is to be afforded to such persons it should be under a fixed provision of law.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have a statement from the Chair on the situation. As I understand the Chair, we simply are reading this bill under the five-minute rule. There is no general debate, and I had no time to yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. The gentleman would have five minutes himself to amend the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that the gentleman from Massachusetts was talking in the five minutes yielded to him by the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. WALSH. This bill has not been read for amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thought it had been.

Mr. WALSH. No. It has simply been reported.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LITTLE. As I understand it, there has been no general debate on this bill. All we are here for is for amendment under the five-minute rule, and I did not have any time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no time except five minutes. This bill is being considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Under those circumstances there is no general debate, but there is five minutes of debate for amendment.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman can move formally to amend if he wants five minutes, and I intend that everybody shall have that opportunity.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was not here when the gentleman from Massachusetts commenced, and supposed he was talking in the time of the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. LITTLE. I make the point of order that there can be no discussion until the bill is read.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be reported.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have a quorum. I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman just made the point of order within a few minutes, and I make the point of order that his present point is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that the point of no quorum is dilatory. Everybody has the right to a quorum for the transaction of business. In the Chair's opinion it can only be dilatory when there has just been a proof that a quorum is present and it is not probable that that quorum has disappeared. But the Chair does not think that applies to the present case. The Chair will count.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves that the House do now adjourn. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the motion was lost.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is too late. The Chair has made the announcement. [After counting.] No quorum is present.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this call 226 Members, a quorum, have answered to their names.

Mr. LITTLE. I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. LITTLE. I asked unanimous consent that these claims be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BLANTON. I move to lay this bill on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will first report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 2452) for the relief of Charles A. Carey.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay this bill on the table.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold that motion for two minutes?

Mr. BLANTON. I do not know whether the Chair will recognize me again. If the Chair will recognize me again, I will.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to call the attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and of the House to the fact that this bill which is now before the House is to appropriate $132 for the relief of a letter carrier who slipped on the ice while discharging his official duties, was unable to work for about 40 days, and lost $132 of salary. This bill is to reimburse him for the exact amount of salary which he lost, without any additional compensation of any kind. It has already, in a previous Congress, passed the House. Though in the last Congress, when the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] was on the Committee on Claims, he first objected to this very bill, later, when he understood it, he withdrew his objection. The bill has had the unanimous support of the Committees on Claims of the Sixty-fourth, Sixty-fifth, and Sixty-sixth Congresses.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. Does not the gentleman understand that if this bill is passed it will establish a precedent that will go behind the act of 1914, and that there will probably be about 10,000 claims that will have to be paid?

Mr. ROGERS. We have already established the precedent. We have passed six or eight bills to take care of just such cases. They are not very numerous. Almost all the cases are cared for by the general law, and we passed the general law so that we might eliminate the necessity of dealing with these individual cases. The Postmaster General has said that if the general law had been in effect a few months earlier this particular man would have been within the terms of that general law. The amount involved is small. Congress, both by private legislation and by general legislation, has repeatedly recognized the propriety of legislation of this type. I hope the gentleman will not feel it his duty to oppose the bill, when he was in favor of it and was so recorded in the last Congress.

Mr. BLANTON. The Postmaster General objects to this bill now, and says this claim ought not to be paid.

Mr. ROGERS. The Postmaster General says he can not recommend that any special legislation be passed for the time prior to the enactment of the general compensation law, but that if the compensation law had been in effect a few months earlier this man would have been within its terms.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion.

Mr. LITTLE. A point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LITTLE. No discussion is in order until this bill has been read.

The SPEAKER. This is by unanimous consent.

Mr. LITTLE. And then they can only proceed under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves that this bill be laid upon the table.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 1, noes 160.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. LITTLE. I make the point of order that that is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think he can rule that it is dilatory. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seventy Members present; not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the motion to lay the bill on the table will vote "aye," those opposed "no."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 2, nays 220, answered "present" 2, not voting 205, as follows:

So the motion to lay the bill on the table was lost.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Until further notice:

Mr. TREADWAY with Mr. SMALL.

Mr. VOIGT with Mr. WATKINS.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota with Mr. WILSON of Louisiana.

Mr. BACHARACH with Mr. CLEARY.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana with Mr. COLLIER.

Mr. DUNN with Mr. BLACKMON.

Mr. GOOD with Mr. EVANS of Montana.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania with Mr. FLOOD.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois with Mr. BRUMBAUGH.

Mr. HULINGS with Mr. DAVEY.

Mr. KAHN with Mr. DENT.

Mr. KEARNS with Mr. GARRETT.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan with Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas.

Mr. LANGLEY with Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi.

Mr. LONGWORTH with Mr. MARTIN.

Mr. MANN with Mr. MOORE of Virginia.

Mr. MASON with Mr. LINTHICUM.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania with Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado.

Mr. MOTT with Mr. O'CONNOR.

Mr. REAVIS with Mr. OVERSTREET.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE with Mr. RANDALL of California.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there was 1 aye and 180 noes.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2452) for the relief of Charles A. Carey.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Charles A. Carey, of Lowell, Mass., the sum of $132.57, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for loss of pay on account of injury sustained while in the performance of his duty as a letter carrier at Lowell, Mass., on the 11th day of February, in the year 1913.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were 160 ayes and 2 noes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that is dilatory.

Mr. BLANTON. And I make the point of order that business has been transacted since the Chair last counted a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BAER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Texas can not speak now and interrupt the count.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. I would like to know whether there is not some method by which this filibustering can be stopped.

Mr. LITTLE. Oh, you can not make a silk purse out of a sow's ear.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order—the gentleman is speaking out of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be seated; that is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. The reason I make the inquiry——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I am filibustering; there is no question about that.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. The gentleman told me that he is trying to consume all of the time he can.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is counting for a quorum. [After counting.] One hundred and seventy-six Members present—not a quorum.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. That is not necessary. This is an automatic call. The question is on ordering the previous question. The Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, the Doorkeeper will close the door, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll; and there were—yeas 214, nays 2, answered "present" 1, not voting 213, as follows:

So the previous question was ordered.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. FORDNEY with Mr. HEFLIN.

Mr. TOWNER with Mr. LANHAM.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota with Mr. FERRIS.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois with Mr. MCLANE.

Mr. WALSH with Mr. VINSON.

The SPEAKER. Call my name.

The name of the Speaker was called, and he voted "aye."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LITTLE. Just wait a minute until the Speaker puts the question on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I request the reading of the engrossed copy of the bill.

Mr. RUCKER. I believe I had unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, present here is a large per cent of the membership of the House. Some gentlemen who are not here may be embarrassed by reason of the fact that on these various unexpected and unnecessary roll calls they were not present to vote. Consideration for fellow Members ought to inspire one with broadness, with a sense of right and fair play that would prevent him from needlessly putting his colleagues to the bad. Now, it is well understood by every man in this presence that most of these roll calls to-day would not have been had if it had not been for the peculiar views of one Member of the House. [Applause.] There is no doubt that a Member, whether wisely or unwisely chosen by a constituency [laughter and applause], has certain constitutional rights as a Member which no man can properly question. But I believe, and I say this by way of palliation or excuse of the mistakes that constituents sometimes may make, that they have a right to believe that one elected to this high position would come here and exercise those constitutional privileges with some degree of common sense. [Applause.]

I hear that it is necessary sometimes to do foolish things in order to prevent the improper expenditure of public money. Well, let me say, in a rough way, and my statement is below rather than above the true figures, the cost to the United States is something like $10,000 every day this House sits, counting overhead charges and Members' salaries; and not including salaries, the overhead charges alone are approximately $1,500 or $1,800 or $2,000 a day. We have now before the House a bill, a little bill, involving a pitiful sum of $132, which this Government ought to pay, and yet by reason of the exercise of the constitutional privilege of one Member we have been forced to expend more than $3,000 of the people's money doing nothing but calling the roll. [Applause.] Oh, perhaps I have done unwise things; some people, in common parlance, might have called me a fool, but I will not use that term. I have my convictions, however, and they are strong; no man can fool the people always. You might fool them once or twice, but in the providence of God after a while the light will shine in and people will correct the errors they have made. The idea of saving little money by spending large sums of money in this foolish, very foolish, way is preposterous. This bill, it seems to me, is meritorious. A man working for the Government by misfortune fell and crippled himself, and was thrown out of employment for a period long enough for his wages to amount to $132. He is asking the Government to reimburse him, and yet we, lords of creation, who are now clamoring for a six weeks'—I wish to the Lord it would be six months—recess, during which time we expect to draw our full salary and are entitled to draw it; we draw our salary even though affliction should keep us confined to our beds during the entire year, and nobody ever complains; but when a poor employee by misfortune has been unable to perform his labors and therefore is deprived of the means by which to support his family and appeals to Congress for redress, for pay for the time he was incapacitated, it seems that somewhere in this great country of ours, somewhere under the shadow of that old flag, a man can be found who will expend four or five thousand dollars of the people's money before he will let that poor devil have the small pittance he asks and which Congress is determined he shall have. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for five minutes more; I am not quite through.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, this is a great body of men. You have heard that before, and you all agree to it. [Laughter.] Oh, there may be a few exceptions when you speak of greatness, because we are not all great in the same degree. But there are great men here. There are men here that I am sorry are here—too many on the Republican side [laughter]—but whose friendship I crave; good men, strong men, some possessed of wrong political ideas, of course, but they can not help the hallucination. They are men whose good wishes and friendship I crave, I repeat; and there are men on this side—the Democratic side—for whose friendship and good will I would forfeit most everything I possess. When the time shall have come, as it will come, when I must bid adieu to this service and say farewell to these genial, splendid, noble men on both sides, with whom I have had the honor to associate, I sincerely hope and trust I may take away with me, as a legacy of priceless and inestimable value, the personal friendship, confidence, and respect of all those with whom I have associated.

But, Mr. Speaker, there are worse misfortunes in life than accidents like happened to this man whose case is now pending before the House. When one becomes so obsessed with an idea of his own importance as to justly forfeit the respect of everybody, he has suffered misfortune worse than any tragedy that could happen in a lifetime. [Applause.]

I hope I will always comport myself in a modest and becoming manner. I am one of those who believe that an honest purpose, a sincere effort to perform duty, is the best evidence of a man's real ability and nobility.

Now, let me say to you—and I am not the father of the House, by any means; I am one of the young Members, though I have been here long enough to have seen much important business transacted, business which carried joy and gladness into homes of many people, and I have rejoiced to see the splendid achievements of the membership of this body, both collectively and individually; and I hope that, after these few interruptions we have had to-day, the business of the Congress may be resumed and that progress can be made.

Let me say that in the two roll calls the Member, exercising his constitutional prerogative and right, found somewhere in the entire United States within the sweep of country from Maine to Texas and from the Everglades of Florida to the coast of Alaska, two men to vote, one other than the mover. And on another question when the roll was called, one other Member, as I understand, voted with the gentleman who caused the roll to be called. Now, if this House, with determination to legislate, ever sits down on me in that way, if I have not sense enough to appreciate the warning that everyone is tired of my senseless performance I hope somebody will put a "No. 10" behind me and kick me out of this Chamber, as ought to be done. [Loud applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RUCKER. I hope the gentleman will make it an easy one.

Mr. CANNON. Where we have had proceedings as we have had to-day and under these conditions, in the calling of the roll in order to get a quorum, and no signs of repentance as to the changing of those conditions, does not the gentleman think it is the duty of the Members of the House of Representatives to stay here and keep a quorum?

Mr. RUCKER. I think they ought to be here, and want to suggest to the distinguished gentleman [Mr. CANNON] that this is a Republican House, and his political party is charged with the responsibility of keeping a quorum on the floor. The trouble is with his party, not with mine.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. RUCKER. I hope no one will refuse the request.

Mr. McARTHUR. I withdraw it, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it is the easiest thing in the world for a man to drift downstream with the tide, but the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] should have lived long enough to know that it takes a strong man to swim upstream against the current. It is awfully easy to vote for all the measures our colleagues propose, but hard sometimes to oppose when duty requires it. I dare say that there are not 25 men in this House to-day who know the provisions of the bill now under consideration. The committee reports private claims because some good colleague requests it. No opportunity whatever is given for debate or consideration. Members vote "yea" blindly because the committee has reported it, and it would hurt the feelings of the interested colleague to oppose it, and so such private bills are passed.

It may be a small sum that is involved in the bill, but the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], no matter how long he has stayed here, does not seem to realize the fact that behind this bill there is a bigger question than its amount, for if we allow this claim we shall be forced to allow thousands of similar claims involving millions of dollars not authorized by the act of 1914. It is a precedent which we are about to establish——

Mr. ROGERS. Why was the gentleman in favor of it in the last Congress?

Mr. BLANTON. I refuse to yield. It is the precedent of going behind the law of 1914, something that Congress did not see fit to do. I was on the Claims Committee last year, I will tell my good friend from Missouri, and I worked faithfully, as every Member on that Claims Committee knows. I filed scores of minority reports. If you will look back in the Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pages 110 to 117 (3d sess., 65th Cong.), you will see some of them and learn of the tedious hours of hard work I did concerning such legislation, and the hundreds of thousands of dollars I was instrumental in saving. The expenses of Congress are the same every day, whether we are answering roll calls or passing private claims. It costs the people more, however, every time we pass a private claim. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] is now preparing for a six weeks' recess. He deserves it, and we all deserve it, and I hope Congress agrees to it. But our expenses every day during that recess will be the same as when we are in session. Not a salary will stop. Every item of expense will continue. Last session I worked 16 hours a day, and when the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] brought in his bill, No. 12018, which, principal and interest, sought to pay to the Sevier heirs $66,736,387.60, an old claim, 105 years old, by the hard work that I did night and day on that bill I finally defeated it and kept it from being reported and passed. There are hundreds of such bills and thousands of such claims, similar to this Carey one, seeking to go behind the law of 1914.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I am sorry; I can not yield to anyone; I have no time. I will yield if you will get me more time. Thousands of them, and if you pass this one you have got to allow every one of them—something that Congress did not see fit to do when it passed the law of 1914. Every time I force a roll call to-day I thereby keep several private bills from passing; some vicious, unjust ones. If time were given for proper discussion and consideration, it would be a different matter. But I am saving the people money.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] need not think that his harsh, unkind criticism will deter me from doing my duty. I love every man in this House, but if to retain their friendship it is necessary to agree to everything they propose and to unjustly vote the people's money out of the Treasury without proper discussion and consideration of legislation, I will have to get along without their friendship. I came to Congress to serve and represent my constituents, not my colleagues. My first duty is to my constituents. When my colleagues reflect I will have the friendship of all worth having. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] may think my people do not know the kind of service I am giving them. I would rather satisfy them than the gentleman from Missouri. They are acquainted with the kind of service I am giving them, and in the last primary election they expressed their satisfaction and approval by giving me a majority of over 15,000 over three opponents, one an ex-Congressman and the other two legislators. I was their circuit judge for eight years, and they are about as well acquainted with me as any constituents are with any other Member of this House and know the kind of service I give. I am sorry I have displeased the gentleman from Missouri with my service.

Mr. McARTHUR. Does the gentleman say "circus" or "service"?

Mr. BLANTON. Both. [Laughter.] But if you will stay here in your seats and help the Republican Party, that put us Democrats out of power because our Republican friends said we could not keep a quorum last year—if you will stay here and help us keep a quorum you will find out something about the legislation that you are voting on without knowing a thing on God's earth about it.

The great trouble with private-bill day and the consideration of these private claims is that Congressmen are not sufficiently interested in them either to investigate them or to stay here on the floor and find out something about them. Under the call of the Private Calendar in this House you know as well as I do that with few exceptions about the only men who sit in these seats here are men who have a bill in their hip pocket to take the people's money out of the Treasury on some private claim, and naturally you can not get one of them to vote against the bill of anybody else, the old slogan, "You help me and I will help you," applying. You have a stack there to pass upon, measures to spend the people's money out of the Public Treasury. If you stay here and give these bills consideration, and get this committee to allow full and fair discussion, you will not find me filibustering. I am filibustering. I am trying my best to keep a precedent from being established that will take thousands and thousands of dollars out of your Treasury.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I can not yield.

The people are not interested in this legislation. It benefits only the private claimants into whose pockets money from the Public Treasury is poured. I am trying to stop it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. Does the gentleman from Texas demand the reading of the engrossed bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; to keep it from passing to-day.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROGERS. The previous question having been ordered and the demand being made for the copy of the engrossed bill, does the pending bill come up to-morrow as unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I demand the reading of the next bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas calls up the next bill, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the House has taken up for consideration the Private Calendar. If Members will remain here, bills can be disposed of. I trust that Members will remain in their seats and attend to the public business. If that is done, all the bills on this calendar can be considered and disposed of. [Applause.]

FRANK PINKLEY.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill on the calendar.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 687) for the relief of Frank Pinkley.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $350 to Frank Pinkley, of Blackwater, Ariz., for certain improvements made by him upon the withdrawn land adjacent to the ruin of Casa Grande, Ariz., during the time that he was custodian of said ruin.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, if anybody who is opposed to this bill desires to offer an amendment to it, which will give him five minutes' time to discuss the amendment—the only way it can be debated now—I will wait until he has offered his amendment.

Mr. BLACK. I would like to get time to ask the gentleman this question: I have read the letter of the Secretary of the Interior with reference to this claim, and it seems that this man was taking care of the Casa Grande ruin.

Mr. LITTLE. Excuse me just one minute. Under the rules I am not entitled to any time to answer questions. The gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], who introduced this bill, is on his feet to make a formal motion to strike out the last word, and he will answer the gentleman's question. Then I wish to be heard.

Mr. HAYDEN. I move to strike out the last word, and when recognized I shall be glad to answer any question the gentleman from Texas wishes to ask about this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arizona moves to strike out the last word, and is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BLACK. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: When did this man make these improvements, and how long did he have the use of them himself?

Mr. HAYDEN. About a year, if my recollection is correct. He was appointed custodian of the Casa Grande ruin, and served in that capacity for some little time. He made these improvements about a year before he had to give up the office by reason of having been elected a member of the Arizona State Legislature, which made it impossible for him to hold a Federal office. Mr. Pinkley submitted a claim to the Department of the Interior to be recompensed for the construction of a well which he dug, because prior to that time there was no way for visitors to the Casa Grande ruin to get water. He dug this well at his own expense, and likewise built a small house, which was used and occupied by the next custodian. He submitted a claim to the department for $467. The department agreed that he should be paid $350, but found that no funds were available. He has agreed to accept that amount, and Secretary Lane concludes his report on this bill which I introduced for Mr. Pinkley's relief by saying—

I therefore recommend that the bill be enacted with the substitution of $350 in the place of $467.

The bill was favorably reported in that amount in a previous Congress and now carries an appropriation of but $350.

Mr. BLACK. How long did he himself use the improvement? I have asked that question with a view to ascertaining if he did not use them long enough to reimburse him for the cost?

Mr. HAYDEN. My recollection is that he used them about a year before he gave up the custodianship. I shall include as a part of my remarks a letter that I received from Mr. Pinkley which fully explains the situation.

BLACKWATER, ARIZ.,
January 2, 1917.

Hon. CARL HAYDEN,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HAYDEN: I have your letter of December 28, inclosing a copy of the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, regarding my claim for reimbursement for improvements made at the Casa Grande ruin while I was custodian there.

There is a bit of concealed humor in this department letter—about $117 worth one way you might view it. They are right about my offer to take $350 and call it square. I didn't want to pike around splitting dollars and bothering you like I've had to, so I set that arbitrary value on the outfit and hoped they would pinch it out of some department fund and we could get immediate action and avoid red tape. But the department, not minding some read tape, and thinking maybe I had that human frailty which appraises its own property through a magnifying glass, started me through this circumlocution-office method of getting a sworn appraisement. Now, having found that I was really making a good offer in the first place, they are willing to back up and take that much of the original plan.

Now, the investment at the ruins is a dead loss as it lays as far as I am concerned. The department wouldn't let me move any of the buildings. The present custodian, by order of the department, he says, refused to pay any rent, and yet, while they claim title to the buildings and well and are using them, they act like they are doing me a darned big favor to O. K. my claim for about 75 per cent of the value arrived at by their own suggested methods.

Our mutual friend, Omar, says, "Take the cash and let the credit go." It is good advice. Play them for the $350. By all means accept the offer and let us get rid of it.

And if they renege again, offer to play them seven-up, best three in five, winner to take the title.

Seriously, I thank you very much indeed for your kindness. I appreciate it, and am sorry for the loss of time and general bother this matter has been to you.

Sincerely,

FRANK PINKLEY.

Mr. LITTLE. How much time did the gentleman from Arizona use?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LITTLE. How much time did the gentleman from Arizona use?

The SPEAKER. He has no more time.

Mr. LITTLE. I ask for the reading of the report in my time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report in the gentleman's time.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 687) for the relief of Frank Pinkley, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it do pass.

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, under date of December 22, 1916, is appended hereto and made a part of this report.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, December 22, 1916.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I have your letter of December 11 requesting report on H. R. 17692, a bill proposing to appropriate $467 to reimburse Frank Pinkley for certain improvements made upon the lands within the Casa Grande ruin in Arizona during the time that he was custodian thereof.

It appears that Mr. Pinkley dug and curbed a well and built a house upon this land. After he resigned as custodian of the ruin he stated that he would be willing to take $350 as reimbursement for his expenditure. There were no funds available for this purpose. The present custodian of the ruin is living in the house constructed by Mr. Pinkley, there being no other place of habitation on the land.

While the expenditure was made by Mr. Pinkley without any authorization by the department, and there is no legal liability upon the part of the Government to reimburse him, yet I feel that it would be but right that he be given the fair value of the work done, and I therefore recommend that the bill be enacted with the substitution of $350 in the place of $467.

Cordially, yours,

FRANKLIN K. LANE, Secretary.

Hon. E. W. POU,
Chairman Committee on Claims, House of Representatives.

Mr. LITTLE. We have reported this bill to pay this man $350, as recommended by the Secretary of the Interior. I move the previous question on this bill.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LITTLE. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. What was this man paid for his services?

Mr. HAYDEN. My recollection is that he was paid at the rate of $40 a month. In any event his salary was a very nominal sum.

Mr. LITTLE. I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 160, noes 1.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seventy-two Members present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members. Those in favor of the passage of the bill will, as their names are called, vote "aye," those opposed "no," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 210, nays 0, answered "present" 3, not voting 217, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. GILLETT, and he answered "aye," as above recorded.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, the previous question having been ordered, this bill will be in order to-morrow morning as unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. It will.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 29 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, July 26, 1919, at 12 o'clock m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of appropriation for the purchase of the Baltimore Quarantine Station (H. Doc. No. 162); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimate of appropriation for the Boston (Mass.) Quarantine Station and the New York (N. Y.) appraisers' stores (H. Doc. No. 163); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. MAPES, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5416) to authorize corporations organized in the District of Columbia to change their names, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 153), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. DOWELL, from the Committee on Elections No. 3, to which was referred the resolution (H. Res. 105) authorizing an extension of time for taking testimony, arranging orderly procedure, and providing other relief in the Alaska contested-election cases, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 154), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 26, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, fit us for the changes wrought by the onward sweep of time, that we may keep pace as individuals and as a people with them. Egotism, selfishness, greed, hate, revenge, must give way to the eternal laws, fixed and unvarying.

Life is now. The future will take care of itself if we measure up to the duties of the present. To be deliberate, cool, self-poised, with high ideals, are the requisites to life and its changes. When the infirmities of age overtake us, help us to grow old gracefully and leave behind us a record worthy of emulation. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ESTABLISHMENT OF FREE PORTS—CHANGE OF REFERENCE OF BILL H. R. 414.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, the bill H. R. 414, to provide for the establishment and maintenance of free zones in the ports of the United States, and for other purposes, has been referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The Committee on Ways and Means believe this bill to be a revenue measure, and have instructed me to move that the bill be rereferred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the reference of the bill 414 be changed from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, that bill was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and that committee has appointed a subcommittee for its consideration. I feel that the principal part of the bill deals with interstate commerce, and the only jurisdiction of the Committee on Ways and Means would be to protect customs. The purpose of the bill is to develop interstate commerce. I believe that the bill has been rightfully referred.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, all revenue bills should go to the Committee on Ways and Means. There is no question but that this bill affects the revenues, and it seems to me there can be no excuse for referring it to any other committee of the House. Under existing law raw materials imported pay a certain duty, according to the tariff laws. Then, when converted into a finished product, there is a drawback of 99 per cent of the duty paid. This bill would create ports and zones about the ports where importations can be brought into the country, manufactured, and then sent abroad without the payment of any duty. It is a bill that requires very careful thought and certainly affects the revenues of the Government.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Have not all such bills heretofore been referred to the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. FORDNEY. So far as I know, all such bills have gone to the Committee on Ways and Means. Whether they did or not, they should have gone there under the Constitution.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say that they have.

Mr. GARNER. This is undoubtedly a revenue bill.

Mr. FORDNEY. No other committee is authorized to deal with revenue measures except the Committee on Ways and Means in the House of Representatives.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. These same bills were before the Committee on Ways and Means at the last session of Congress, were they not?

Mr. FORDNEY. They were, or similar bills were, providing for free ports, and they have always been referred to that committee.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. What is the request of the gentleman?

Mr. FORDNEY. The request is that the bill H. R. 414, now referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, be rereferred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. This is not a revenue measure at all, if the gentleman will pardon me.

Mr. FORDNEY. What is it, if it is not? Does it not affect the revenues of the Government, because all such imports now pay a duty? When converted to a finished product for export there is a rebate on that duty of 99 per cent. If that is not a revenue measure, then I do not know what a revenue measure is.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. It is not a revenue measure at all, because it relates to imports that would come into the country that are not coming here now.

Mr. FORDNEY. It is a change of existing law. It will permit certain articles to come in which are now dutiable, and therefore it must affect the revenue laws of the Government if this bill becomes a law as it is written.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not a fact that the free-port system would provide that if goods were taken out of the stockade they would have to pay the ordinary customs duties?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Why, of course. The bill provides that goods are brought into a free zone and that they can not be used for consumption. They can not be used in the ordinary affairs of the country at all, and as soon as they pass out of that zone they pay the same duty as any other goods pay.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And while in the zone they must be subject to the supervising of the customs officials?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Absolutely.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And if they move from the zone for sale in the United States they must pay the duties prescribed by the revenue laws?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Absolutely.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So it is clearly a revenue measure coming under the ordinary revenue system?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. It is clearly not a revenue measure. It does not take one dollar of revenue out of the Treasury or put one dollar of revenue into the Treasury.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It will if one dollar's worth gets outside of the stockade.

Mr. FORDNEY. But some of these goods now pay a duty that you propose to bring into the free zone.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. No; it does not. It does not propose to bring anything into the country free of duty.

Mr. FORDNEY. Sugar now pays a duty of a cent a pound from Cuba and a cent and a quarter coming from other duty-paying countries?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is raw material, sir; and when converted into refined sugar and exported there is a drawback of 99 per cent of all duty paid; and the gentleman proposes to change that law. That is a revenue measure. I would like to see how you get around it.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I do not propose to change the law.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman intend to make a motion for a change of reference?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MONDELL. The question is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. This is all by unanimous consent, of course.

Mr. FORDNEY. I move, Mr. Speaker, that the bill H. R. 414, now before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, be rereferred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] moves that the bill H. R. 414, now referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, be rereferred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Could I make a statement of about 30 seconds with regard to this matter?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to speak for 30 seconds. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, this bill is now before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. That committee has taken the matter up, it has been referred to a subcommittee, and the subcommittee has been working upon it. In addition to that I want to say, with all due deference to the gentleman from Michigan, that the statement he makes that this is a revenue measure does not of itself make it a revenue measure.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. ESCH) there were—ayes 54, noes 33.

So the motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business before the House is the bill (H. R. 2452) for the relief of Charles A. Carey, on which the previous question was ordered and the bill had reached the point where the reading of the engrossed copy of the bill was demanded. The bill will be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. LITTLE and Mr. ROGERS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Also the unfinished business is the bill (H. R. 687) for the relief of Frank Pinkley. That bill had reached the stage of passage. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. LITTLE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House proceed to the consideration of bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar and at the conclusion of the consideration of bills on that calendar the following gentlemen may be given leave to address the House: Mr. FORDNEY of Michigan for one hour, Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana for 30 minutes, Mr. DENISON of Illinois for one hour, and Mr. HUDSPETH of Texas for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request made by the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MONDELL. And at the expiration of the period provided for that the House will then adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That is not necessary.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman have any objection to adding to it 30 minutes for the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. JOHNSON]?

Mr. MONDELL. I have not, with the understanding that these requests are for to-day only, and that if the gentlemen are not able to speak to-day that the permission shall not be for another day.

Mr. FERRIS. Let me inquire as to how long you intend to run the Unanimous Consent Calendar to-day?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think the Unanimous Consent Calendar will take a very great length of time. They are mostly bridge bills.

Mr. FERRIS. Is it the gentleman's thought that they can all get in to-day?

Mr. MONDELL. I think they can.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman from Montana object to increasing the time allotted to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH] from 30 minutes to 1 hour? I would like to state that the gentleman is to discuss the situation on the Mexican border. He was born and raised on the border, and he knows more about the Mexican situation than any other man I know of in the House, and I am sure every man in the House would like to hear from him. You can not discuss that question in 30 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. The time I requested in behalf of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH] was the time I understood he desired.

Mr. BLANTON. Would the gentleman increase that to one hour?

Mr. MONDELL. I would like to hear from the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH].

Mr. HUDSPETH. I will say that I think I can complete my remarks in 30 minutes; in 40 minutes at the outside.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]?

There was no objection.

UNANIMOUS CONSENT CALENDAR.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

LOAN OF MACHINE TOOLS, ETC., TO SCHOOLS AND UNIVERSITIES.

The first business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 3143) to provide for further educational facilities by requiring the War Department to loan certain machine tools and scientific instruments not in use for Government purposes to trade and technical schools and universities, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

BRIDGE ACROSS NEWARK BAY, N. J.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 1378) to authorize the Central Railroad Co. of New Jersey to construct a bridge across the navigable waters of Newark Bay, in the State of New Jersey.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That authority be, and is hereby, granted to the Central Railroad Co. of New Jersey, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of New Jersey, its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge, and approaches thereto, across the Newark Bay, in the State of New Jersey, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation between the city of Elizabeth, in the county of Union, and the city of Bayonne, in the county of Hudson, in said State, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ESCH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS RAINY RIVER, MINN., TO PROVINCE OF ONTARIO.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 5648) for the construction of a bridge across the Rainy River between Spooner, Minn., and Rainy River, Province of Ontario, Canada.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby given to the construction, maintenance, and operation by the State of Minnesota and the Dominion of Canada, jointly, of a bridge to be erected across the Rainy River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, between Spooner, Minn., and Rainy River, Province of Ontario, Canada, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906: Provided, That the construction of said bridge shall not be commenced until the consent of the proper authorities of the Dominion of Canada for the erection of the structure shall have been obtained.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the attention of the gentleman having this measure in charge to the language in lines 3 and 4 of the bill. It does not seem to conform to the general language used in these measures. It reads:

That the consent of Congress is hereby given to the construction, maintenance, and operation by the State of Minnesota—

And so forth.

The usual phraseology, I think, is: "That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the parties getting the consent to construct, maintain, and operate," and I desire——

Mr. ESCH. That is true, and I would suggest that the gentleman offer an amendment.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to ask if the preposition "for," in line 3, instead of "to," would not be appropriate, so that it would read:

That the consent of Congress is hereby given for the construction, maintenance, and operation by the State of Minnesota and the Dominion of Canada, jointly, of a bridge—

And so forth.

I move to strike out of line 3 the word "to" and insert the word "for."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 3, after the word "given," strike out the word "to" and insert in lieu thereof the word "for."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KNUTSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSISSIPPI RIVER AT MINNEAPOLIS.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 5228) granting the consent of the Congress to the city of Minneapolis, a municipal corporation, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of the Congress is hereby granted to the city of Minneapolis, a municipal corporation of the State of Minnesota, and its successors, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Mississippi River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near the intersection of Franklin Avenue, in said city of Minneapolis, with the said Mississippi River, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ESCH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS SAVANNAH RIVER, AUGUSTA, GA.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 6438) authorizing the counties of Aiken, S. C., and Richmond, Ga., to construct a bridge across the Savannah River at or near Augusta, Ga.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the counties of Aiken, S. C., and Richmond, Ga., be and are hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Savannah River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation at or near Augusta, Ga., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SIMS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS FLINT RIVER, GA.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 6805) to authorize the county of Dougherty, State of Georgia, to construct a bridge across the Flint River, connecting Broad Street, in the city of Albany, said State and county, with the Isabella Road, said county and State.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the county of Dougherty, State of Georgia, be, and it is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Flint River, connecting Broad Street, in the city of Albany, said county and State, with the Isabella Road, said county and State, the same to be located where present bridge now is (if the engineers decide best), a few feet south of the present bridge.

With committee amendments, as follows:

In line 5, page 1, after the word "River," insert the following words: "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation."

In lines 5 and 6, strike out the word "connecting" and insert the words "to connect."

In line 9, strike out the words "the same to be located where" and insert the words "and at or near the site of."

In lines 1 and 2, page 2, strike out the words "now is (if the engineers decide best), a few feet south of the present bridge" and insert "in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters,' approved March 23, 1906."

Add a new section to read:

"SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ESCH, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE PEND OREILLE RIVER, WASH.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 6342) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pend Oreille River at the town of Usk, in the State of Washington.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Pend Oreille County, State of Washington, its successors and assigns, be, and it is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Pend Oreille River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation at the town of Usk, in said county and State, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS RED RIVER, TEX.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 6434) authorizing the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto across Red River about 2 miles above its confluence with the Washita River, near Preston, Grayson County, Tex.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if this is to be a toll bridge?

Mr. RAYBURN. I so understand.

Mr. WALSH. And is it to take the place of an existing structure?

Mr. RAYBURN. No. There is nothing there now.

Mr. WALSH. It is to connect with a public highway?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I was under the impression that Congress was seeking to discourage the further authorization of toll bridges throughout the country. I wondered what particular necessity there was that warranted the reporting of this measure.

Mr. RAYBURN. On that part of the Red River there is no connection between Texas and Oklahoma—densely populated sections of each State—and a bridge certainly is very much needed there to open up communication between Texas and Oklahoma.

Mr. WALSH. Yes. There ought to be intercommunication between the two States, but why should there be a fee imposed on the use of the bridge?

Mr. RAYBURN. I really am not informed on that point, whether or not this is to be a toll bridge. I know that $100,000 has been raised by the people there for the construction of a bridge at that point. Just exactly what kind of a bridge it is to be I do not know; but I presume there will be some way by which the men can get back the interest on the money they have invested in it.

Mr. WALSH. I do not know why we should be more interested in a bridge company getting back the money it has invested in a bridge than the counties and municipalities getting back what they have invested. If this is a highway bridge connecting highways in Texas and Oklahoma, I do not think that that ought to enter into the consideration of the matter. If there is necessity for it, it seems to me they ought to arrange between the two States for the construction of a public highway bridge, just the same as we have done in one or two measures that have been passed. Is this bridge in the gentleman's district?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. On the fringe of the gentleman's district?

Mr. RAYBURN. It is at one end of it.

Mr. WALSH. This is a boundary stream dividing the two States?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; the Red River.

Mr. WALSH. Are there any other toll bridges in that locality?

Mr. RAYBURN. There are some bridges east of Denison.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Speaker, if I may I think I can answer. There are a number of toll bridges above, between Oklahoma and Texas. That is about the only way they can get bridges built; that is, by erecting toll bridges.

Mr. WALSH. Why is that? I should think, in view of the tremendous boom in oil and other products in that section of the country, that those counties and municipalities would be able to construct their own bridges and not let public highways run on to a bridge and require the travel to pay.

Mr. RAYBURN. There is not any oil boom in this immediate neighborhood yet.

Mr. WALSH. I am not inclined to let this measure go through by unanimous consent.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does not the gentleman think it would be better to have a toll bridge than no bridge?

Mr. WALSH. That depends. There is no evidence of suffering so far on the part of Texas and Oklahoma, and if there had been fewer bridges between Texas and Mexico there would be less suffering on the border now.

Mr. RAYBURN. What the gentleman says is not the fact with respect to those parts of Texas and Oklahoma that are concerned in this matter. That country is fast developing, but there is no railroad there at all.

Mr. WALSH. There has not been suffering enough to impel the counties and municipalities to undertake the construction of this bridge to which they are asking the consent of Congress. I am not inclined to consent to the passage of this bill by unanimous consent.

Mr. DENISON. This is for the construction of a bridge across the Red River, and the Red River is so very broad and deep that no county could raise public funds to build a bridge across it between two States. It has got to be done either by the State or by private individuals. Of course, it is difficult to get the State to do it, and the people may need this bridge.

Mr. WALSH. How broad is the Red River at this point?

Mr. RAYBURN. At least a mile.

Mr. WALSH. Has the gentleman crossed the river there?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; but I have crossed it at several other places. I know it is a very broad river.

Mr. PARRISH. It is nearly a mile across at that point.

Mr. WALSH. Because of the fact that the Red River is very broad at this particular point, and that it will probably cause a great deal of suffering to impose the expense on the counties, I will not object [applause]; but I want to say that you had a narrow escape, anyhow. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read as follows.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Preston Bridge Co., a corporation, be, and it is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across Red River at a point on the south bank of said river immediately north of Preston, in Grayson County, Tex., to a point immediately north of said beginning and located in Marshall County, Okla., and such point being about 2 miles west of the confluence of Red River with the Washita River near Preston, Tex., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby reserved.

With the following committee amendments:

In line 6, page 1, insert "suitable to the interests of navigation."

Page 2, line 6, insert the word "expressly."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. ESCH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WAR RISK INSURANCE.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 6450) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department, approved September 2, 1914,' as amended."

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, is the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] in charge of the bill?

Mr. ESCH. I was not on the subcommittee that had it under consideration. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] was on that subcommittee, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET], chairman of the subcommittee, wrote the report. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] is unavoidably absent today, but he is very anxious to have the bill passed.

Mr. GARD. I notice from the report on the bill that it seems to apply to only one case. I am not opposing the purpose of the bill in extending the privileges of the War Risk Insurance to the one man who was so badly injured whom the bill provides for; but if there is only one case, as the report shows, according to information received from officials of the War Risk Insurance, that being the case of Henry A. Bitter, of Dubuque, Iowa, I was wondering whether instead of being a general bill this is not more properly a bill for special and particular relief—a private-claims bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. No; that is what the committee are trying to get away from. We are trying to make this bill broad enough and liberal enough in its general terms to cover every case that we think ought to be covered, and prevent thereby an influx of special bills. The War Department, the Navy Department, and the Bureau of War Risk Insurance know of only one case of this kind that happened during the war.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. GARD. Surely.

Mr. WALSH. Is it not a fact that while the War Risk Insurance Bureau are not definitely advised, they believe there are two or three other cases such as this on the other side, who have not been brought to this country?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Yes; that is true.

Mr. RAYBURN. They testified that this is the only case they knew definitely about, although there might be a few more.

Mr. GARD. Further reserving the right to object, I should like to know whether this bill has the approval of the War Department, of the Navy Department, and of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance? I do not want to object to the bill, and will not; but it seems to me on the showing made in this report that it is essentially a bill for a private claim in a particular case, that of this unfortunate citizen of Iowa whom every Member of this House would, I am sure, wish to afford the utmost relief possible.

Mr. RAYBURN. Oh, no.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. On the contrary.

Mr. ESCH. The Bureau of War Risk Insurance approved the measure.

Mr. GARD. There is nothing in the report to show any approval by the War Risk Insurance Bureau, so far as I can see. The report is merely a statement that this applies to one case, and consists of a statement by Mr. Bitter, a resident of Dubuque, Iowa, in which he recites the particulars of his injury. I believe we ought to afford every possible relief to any person injured as this man has been injured, but I do not want to go so far as to pass a general bill under unanimous consent and with no report made on the general proposition, but only on this one particular case, which, by the way, seems of unquestioned merit.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Suppose there are two?

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Bitter came here all the way from his home and appeared before the committee. Whether or not the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, the War Department, or the Navy Department had indorsed the provisions of this bill, to cover this case and those of any other men in the same situation, the committee certainly would have reported this bill favorably, seeing this man and knowing the helpless condition in which he finds himself. We would have done that even though the others had not indorsed it. This man has a double total disability. He is totally blind and both of his hands are gone. He has been through the Walter Reed Hospital. He has been at the hospitals for the rehabilitation of men all over the United States, and they say there is not one thing that they can do for him whereby he can ever be able to do anything for himself. He is in such a condition that he must have the constant attendance of an able-bodied attendant, because there is not one thing that he can do. If he had lost two eyes and two feet he would have been in a better shape. If he had lost two feet and one arm and both eyes he would have been in better shape than he is, because he could have felt with his remaining hand and have done something; but to a man in this shape artificial hands are of no use, because he can not see to use them. We have made the law broad enough to cover every case that may arise where there is a double total disability.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. I would like to ask if the committee has given any consideration to this phase of it, where a soldier has lost one leg and one arm on opposite sides. I ask that question because I happened to meet in Washington a young man from Idaho who had lost one leg close to the body and, on the opposite side, an arm off at the shoulder. He tells me that he only gets under the act $30 a month, whereas if he had both arms off or both legs off he would receive a much larger compensation. This young man is practically helpless.

Mr. RAYBURN. A man with the right arm off and the right leg off is in worse shape than the man who has a leg off on the right side and the left arm off. The committee has completed hearings and is in the course of reporting a bill to liberalize all these matters.

Mr. CRISP. This young man is from Idaho, and I only have the same interest in him that I would have in any other one of our maimed heroes, but I certainly think he is entitled to more compensation than $30 a month when he has lost one arm and one leg in the defense of his country.

Mr. RAYBURN. I introduced a bill some time ago, and it will be incorporated in the omnibus bill, which will take care of such cases.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. I should like to ask whether the omnibus bill which the gentleman has introduced, and upon which the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has had hearings, is broad enough to care for the particular case contemplated in this bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. No; it does not cover this.

Mr. ROGERS. May there not be additional cases beyond this single case?

Mr. RAYBURN. We are passing a general act, so that if cases develop in the same situation they will be taken care of.

Mr. ROGERS. I understand; but my inquiry is whether there might not later on injuries develop in other cases, besides the case of Bitter, which would come within the terms of the bill now before the House. I realize that the language of the bill is general. My query is whether there might not later on be other cases which would be cared for by this bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. If they are injured in this way they will be taken care of.

Mr. ROGERS. Does the gentleman know whether it is certain that there are not other cases coming within this law?

Mr. RAYBURN. I am not certain.

Mr. DUPRÉ. All the more reason why the bill should be general and not specific.

Mr. ROGERS. Precisely; and my query was whether it would not be well for the gentleman to include in his omnibus bill a provision covering this particular class of cases. It may be well to pass this bill now and get it through the Senate, if possible; but it seems to me that the fewer laws amending the war-risk law the better.

Mr. RAYBURN. The only reason for reporting this bill and not putting it into the omnibus bill is that this case seems to be so bad and so urgent that we thought it would be easier to get this bill through than an omnibus bill with this as a part of it.

Mr. ROGERS. Another question along the line of the question of the gentleman from Georgia. My understanding is that the proposal of the gentleman from Texas which he carries in his omnibus bill is that in the case of temporary total disability, from whatever cause, the rate of compensation shall be $65 a month, and in case of a permanent total disability the rate shall be $100 a month.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is it; and if the disability is of that character that a nurse or attendant is needed $20 a month additional.

Mr. ROGERS. Something of the kind should certainly be done at once.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I happened to be called out of the House when this bill was called up. Is this a special-relief bill?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; it is an amendment to the act.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. What is the substance of the bill?

Mr. RAYBURN. It provides in the law that was passed that a man losing both hands, both feet, or both eyes shall be considered totally disabled and shall be granted a compensation of $100 a month. In this case we provide that a man who has lost both eyes and both hands, or both eyes and both feet, or both feet and both hands, shall be considered doubly totally disabled and compensated at the rate of $200 a month.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I came in just as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] was speaking, and I happen to know the facts in that case. Would that case be covered by this bill?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; you could not say that that man was doubly totally disabled. The bill we propose to report covers a case like that.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I can not see from the gentleman's statement how it could be.

Mr. RAYBURN. But the bill we intend to report from the committee within a week will give more relief to a case like that than is now offered by the law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Further reserving the right to object, and I do merely for the purpose of permitting the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT], if he desires——

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that there can be discussion after the bill is under consideration. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Further reserving the right to object, for another question, do I understand from the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], who has charge of the bill in the absence of the gentleman from Iowa, that this general bill does not cover the particular case of Mr. Bitter?

Mr. RAYBURN. Oh, no. I answered the gentleman that this would not cover the case mentioned by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. GARD. But it does cover the case of this man from Iowa, Mr. Bitter?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. And anyone else similarly wounded.

Mr. GARD. I withdraw any objections I have suggested.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 12 of an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department, approved September 2, 1914,' as amended," be, and is hereby, amended as follows:

At the end of subdivision II, section 12, insert: "Except in case of loss of both hands and both eyes, or in case of loss of both feet and both eyes, or in case of loss of both hands and both feet, in which cases there shall be an allowance of $100 per month for a nurse or attendant, the same in addition to the $100 per month allowed in this act for the loss of both feet, or both hands, or both eyes."

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. There seems to be in the minds of the membership of this committee, particularly in the mind of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD], some question as to the advisability of passing this particular piece of legislation. The gentleman seems to think that this would be in the nature of special legislation, particularly adapted to the emergency of this particular case. It was my duty—not my pleasure, I assure you—to interview the gentleman who is asking for this relief under the provisions of the act. The young man was about 23 years of age when he entered the Army. He was a drug clerk and his earning capacity was about $125 per month. He volunteered; was not drafted. He went into the service across the seas.

After the armistice had been declared, somewhere in Belgium, the American officers ordered what they call an exhibition drill of hand-grenade service, and this soldier was detailed as one of those to take part in that ceremony. Having a hand grenade in his hand and under a smoke barrage, as it is called, in some mysterious way the fuse on this hand grenade was detached and an explosion followed. This was after the armistice was declared. The war was over. This man by that explosion lost both arms and both eyes. He has no means of support whatever except his own earning capacity. His aged mother was before the subcommittee that heard the particulars of the case, but the subcommittee, acting for the general interest, deemed that there should be no special bill introduced for this case, but that in some way we should provide, if possible, a bill which would cover all cases of a similar character. Therefore, calling particular attention to the objection, or suggested objetion, of the gentleman from Ohio——

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. GARD. I have no objection. My only suggestion was that there was only this one case as reported by the bill itself.

Mr. DEWALT. I was about to refer to that. Not styling it as an objection, but as a suggestion, of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD], permit me to say to the committee that the subcommittee in charge very carefully inquired of the War Department and from other officials who had reason to know the details, and they told us that there might possibly be four or five cases of a similar character, not where there was a loss of two eyes and two hands but where there was a loss of two feet and two hands. Therefore, recognizing the fact that this man is entirely helpless, that he can not even attend to the necessities of the toilet unless he has some one with him, that it is necessary to employ a nurse constantly, and the fact that his mother is aged, without any means of support herself, we deemed it proper, knowing that he could not live on the $100 per month under the provisions of the act as now existing, and the $57.50 that constitutes his insurance, that we call this a double disability and give him, instead of $100 a month, $200 a month and the $57.50 under his compensation.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. The House must feel that this is one of the most pathetic cases heard of during the war. There is one sentence from the statement of Mr. Bitter in the report about which I should like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. This is the statement to which I refer:

The expenses incurred by me in my efforts to better my condition since the accident have not been borne by the Government.

That seems to me a rather startling and shocking revelation—that the Government should not lend its resources to this man in every possible way to assist his efforts to get what relief he might.

Mr. DEWALT. The statement as made there is not consistent with the facts, although it is partially so. The young man told us that he had gone to Walter Reed Hospital, that he had gone to a hospital in the city of New York, and had been examined by physicians in these respective places, and they told him that he never could recover his sight; that his medical attendance there had been paid for—at least he did not pay for it—that his transportation to and from these places was paid for by vouchers, but that his actual expenses while there, his hotel expenses, he had paid himself out of money obtained from other people, but that he was assured that when he handed in his expense account the Government would reimburse him for that.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. I will.

Mr. FESS. If the Congress at the time of the framing of this war-risk insurance act had had in mind this double total disability, there is not any doubt but that Congress would have provided for it. Is not that true?

Mr. DEWALT. I think in all charity that would have been done, sir. I do not think there is any doubt about it.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. I will.

Mr. ESCH. Rehabilitation can do this man no good?

Mr. DEWALT. Absolutely none. And in furtherance of what the gentleman from Wisconsin has said we asked him as to whether he could help himself at all by the use of artificial arms, and he said that they had provided him with artificial arms and hands, and that he had no sense of touch, and therefore could not make any use of them at all.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ESCH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET], who reported this bill, be permitted to extend his remarks on the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

BRIDGE BETWEEN CEDAR POINT AND DAUPHIN ISLAND, ALA.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 5226) further extending the time for the commencement and completion of the bridge or bridges authorized by an act entitled "An act to amend an act to authorize the Dauphin Island Railway & Harbor Co., its successors or assigns, to construct and maintain a bridge or bridges, or viaducts, across the water between the mainland, at or near Cedar Point and Dauphin Island, both Little and Big; also to dredge a channel from the deep waters of Mobile Bay into Dauphin Bay; also to construct and maintain docks and wharves along both Little and Big Dauphin Islands," approved June 18, 1912, as extended by an act approved June 30, 1916.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama if he thinks that by extending the time this bridge will be built?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes, sir; I do.

Mr. WALSH. Well, it has had two whacks at it and has not absolutely done anything.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I will state to the gentleman that one whack came at a very inopportune time. The war came on and material was high and expensive; furthermore, the Government did not encourage matters of this character, and like many other industries it had to shut down or curtail its proposition.

Mr. WALSH. Why is it necessary to extend the time for beginning the bridge seven years?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Part of this railroad has been constructed.

Mr. WALSH. I know, but the time for completing——

Mr. McDUFFIE. It does not extend it seven years. The gentleman will notice this act simply amends an act to extend time two and four years after 1916. The time to begin work on the bridge, under the last act, expired September 18 of the year 1918.

Mr. WALSH. No; you further extend it seven years from 1916.

Mr. McDUFFIE. No; I do not think so.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman will read the concluding lines, he will see that it has further extended to seven and nine years, respectively, from and after the 18th day of September, 1916.

Mr. McDUFFIE. But does that not date back to the original extension, back to the original act? In other words, it carries from 1912 for seven years and nine years, respectively.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, no; the gentleman is mistaken there. It carries back to September 18, 1916, and they have got from September 18, 1923, to begin to operate.

Mr. McDUFFIE. No; I think the gentleman is wrong about that.

Mr. WALSH. And they have a year from September 18, 1925, to complete the bridge.

Mr. McDUFFIE. No; I think the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. WALSH. I will ask the gentleman to construe this language, "It is hereby further extended to seven and nine years, respectively, from and after the 18th day of September, 1916."

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes, sir. I construe this act to mean that the time of the original act was extended from 1912 two and four years, and the time again extended from 1916.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman will admit that is not what it says?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I will admit the section does not state it, but I will say to the gentleman that in the event the latter construction is put upon this bill there could be absolutely no objection from anybody to carrying out this proposition.

Mr. WALSH. We might just as well pass a bill here saying they can begin this bridge and complete it at any time within the twentieth century, because if the gentleman's argument is sound there is a bridge that was given consent June 28, 1912, and they did not begin it. Now that was in 1912, that is before the war broke out in Europe——

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes, sir. However, I will state to the gentleman that they have built several miles of this road, over a marshy country, and they are building up to this main channel and have spent over $50,000 already in the construction of this project.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman have any objection to inserting as section 2 of this act, that the right to amend, alter, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Why, certainly I have no objection to it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement I will withdraw the reservation of an objection. I desire to offer an amendment when that stage is reached.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, the Senate has passed this bill——

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for the commencement and completion of the bridge or bridges authorized by the act entitled "An act to amend an act to authorize the Dauphin Island Railway & Harbor Co., its successors or assigns, to construct and maintain a bridge or bridges, or viaducts, across the water between the mainland, at or near Cedar Point, and Dauphin Island, both Little and Big; also to dredge a channel from the deep waters of Mobile Bay into Dauphin Bay; also to construct and maintain docks and wharves along both Little and Big Dauphin Islands," approved June 18, 1912, as extended by an act approved June 30, 1916, is hereby further extended to seven and nine years, respectively, from and after the 18th day of September, 1916.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, the bill S. 1361, which is now in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, contains the identical language of this bill, and in order to expedite matters I ask that it be substituted instead of the bill H. R. 5226——

Mr. WALSH. The Senate bill has not been reported.

Mr. McDUFFIE. No.

Mr. WALSH. You can not do that.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the bill S. 1361 and that it be substituted in lieu of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the bill S. 1361, identical with this bill, and that that bill be considered by the House in lieu of this bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. WALSH. I move to amend by inserting a new section, as follows:

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the Senate bill insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."

Mr. ESCH. We have no objection.

Mr. McDUFFIE. We have no objection to that amendment, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McDUFFIE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Also, on motion of Mr. McDUFFIE, a House bill of similar tenor was laid on the table.

AMENDMENT TO WAR-RISK INSURANCE ACT.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill H. R. 5707, being No. 14 on the Union Calendar and introduced by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET], seeking to amend the war-risk insurance act along the line of the bill we have just passed, be stricken from the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

SUBSCRIPTION OF NATIONAL BANKS TO UNITED WAR WORK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was House joint resolution 87, authorizing national banks to subscribe to the united war-work campaign.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD and Mr. WALSH objected.

ENCOURAGEMENT OF FOREIGN TRADE.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 6806) to amend section 25 of the act of December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, for the purpose of encouraging foreign trade.

Mr. DALE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DALE. I want to say something about the bill previous to this one.

The SPEAKER. That would not be in order.

Mr. DALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a statement in that connection.

Mr. WALSH. For how long?

Mr. DALE. Just a minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DALE. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency is not in the House, and the second man on the committee is not in the House, and I am the ranking man, I think, who is present in the House. I ask that this be passed without prejudice and not be stricken from the calendar at this time.

Mr. DUPRÉ. It can go back to the bottom of the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the bill being passed without prejudice?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill H. R. 6806?

Mr. GARD and Mr. WALSH objected.

BRIDGE ACROSS WHITE RIVER, FORSYTH, MO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 6692) to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the White River, at or near Forsyth, Mo.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of this measure what is meant by the language "by the Forsyth special road district, of Taney County, Mo."? Is that a municipal corporation?

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, under the Missouri laws certain townships are permitted to organize themselves into special road districts and with the functions of the ordinary municipal road districts, and when they do so they take over all of the rights of the municipal road districts created by the general law of the State. We have many special road districts in that State, and this particular township, comprising the road district in question, is known as the "Forsyth special road district," and that road district obtained by the original bill the right to bridge White River. But on account of the coming on of the war and the advance in the price of material and the high cost of labor they did not begin the work as early as contemplated, and are now asking leave to extend the time for beginning and completing one and three years.

Mr. WALSH. One and three years?

Mr. HAYS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. That is some evidence, I take it, that this bridge is to be built.

Mr. HAYS. I understand from my correspondence with the officers of that district that they desire to begin the work at once, but will not agree to undertake it unless the time for completion is extended.

Mr. WALSH. That is usually the case where they only ask for an extension of time for one and three years, and usually not the case where they ask extension from seven to nine years.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, does this bridge connect public roads?

Mr. HAYS. I will say that is my understanding. I have not seen the site of the bridge myself—that is, sufficient to be familiar with it—but it is my understanding from the officers of the road district that it does connect highways on either side of this stream. Heretofore the stream has been fordable and no bridge was necessary, but by reason of the construction of a dam by Government authority it is not now fordable, so I am informed.

Mr. GARD. For what purpose was the dam created?

Mr. HAYS. It was built to create power for an electric plant supplying a number of cities with electric light, and perhaps furnishing the motor power for some street railroads.

Mr. GARD. It is a privately owned plant?

Mr. HAYS. That is my impression.

Mr. GARD. Do they require charges to go back and forth over the bridge?

Mr. KNUTSON. Is it a toll bridge?

Mr. HAYS. It is my opinion that it is not a toll bridge. However, I do not want to commit myself to that statement, because I am not sure about it.

Mr. GARD. Unless the gentleman can advise me that it is not a toll bridge I shall have to object. If it is a free bridge across the river, uniting thoroughfares that are necessary, I shall not object.

Mr. HAYS. Before I can do that I will have to see the original bill.

Mr. DUPRÉ. When the bill authorizing the construction of a bridge between Texas and Oklahoma was under consideration the gentleman was present and did not raise such an objection then.

Mr. GARD. I am seeking information.

Mr. DUPRÉ. The gentleman said if this was to be a toll bridge he was going to object. I do not think he should object in view of the precedent set in the Texas-Oklahoma case.

Mr. GARD. Has the gentleman from Missouri any information about it?

Mr. HAYS. I have sent for the original bill, which this seeks to amend, and it will be here in a short time.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be passed over until the end of the calendar, to give opportunity for getting further information.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over until the end of the calendar. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

TRANSFER OF LAND IN CRISTOBAL, CANAL ZONE.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 6222) to remove a certain tract or lots of land in Cristobal, Canal Zone, from the operation and effect of the Executive order of the President of December 5, 1912, pursuant to the act of Congress of August 24, 1912 (37 Stats., ch. 390, p. 565).

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have an explanation by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON], the author of the bill.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill which I introduced by request, to remove a purely technical legal objection to the transfer of certain lots in Cristobal, in the Canal Zone, from the Panama Railroad Co. to the Sojourners' Masonic Lodge.

I will state briefly that in 1912 the Sojourners' Masonic Lodge of Cristobal executed a lease with the Panama Railroad Co. to certain lots in Cristobal for the erection of a Masonic lodge building, and the building was started, but the lodge got into financial difficulties and was unable to complete the building. Afterwards they entered into an agreement with the Panama Railroad Co. by which they surrendered their lease and the Panama Railroad Co. constructed the building for the lodge in accordance with the original plans and specifications. In other words, the Panama Railroad Co. furnished the money and financed it and built the building and entered into a contract with the lodge for the sale of the building to the lodge, to be paid for in five years, and I think the consideration was $130,000.

Now, after the contracts had been entered into it was found that there was a legal obstruction to the transfer, growing out of the Panama Canal act, which authorized the President to take over all lands and lands under water in the Canal Zone that might be considered necessary for the operation, protection, and sanitation of the Canal Zone; and in 1912 President Taft issued his Executive order in pursuance of the Panama Canal act, expropriating all lands unoccupied in the Canal Zone. Of course, the order was not intended to cover lands of this kind, which were in the city of Cristobal, but the order of the President expropriating the lands was general, and constructively transferred the title to this property from the Panama Canal Railroad Co. to the United States Government.

Now, that order of the President is a legal obstruction to the completion of title to this property and the transfer from the Panama Railroad Co. to the Masonic lodge of Cristobal. They have consulted with attorneys, and they claim that the President can not by Executive order straighten out the matter and take this land out from under the provisions of the Executive order of President Taft, and that it will require an act of Congress to do so. I therefore introduced this bill in order to enable them to complete that transaction.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Clearly, as I understand it, it is a technical matter that does not amount to anything, because the Government owns the Panama Railroad Co.?

Mr. DENISON. Yes; it is a technical matter. The building and land belong to the Panama Railroad Co., and the Panama Railroad Co. belongs to the Government; but the Government can not transfer land down there without an act of Congress, and by reason of the Executive order the Panama Railroad Co. can not do so. This bill is simply introduced to enable the Panama Railroad Co. to go ahead and complete this contract.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Has the Department of Justice or the Attorney General made a recommendation in reference to this title?

Mr. DENISON. The question was first submitted to former Representative Sherley, of Kentucky, who took up the matter with the President, and submitted it to the President for an Executive order. The President submitted it to the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of War referred it back to the governor of the Canal Zone; and the governor of the Canal Zone, Gov. Harding, consulted his attorneys and submitted his report to Secretary of War Baker, stating that they had no objection to the transfer except the bare legal one of not having the authority since the Executive order of President Taft was issued. Then Mr. Baker, the Secretary of War, made a report to the President, stating the same thing. These things are all embodied in the report, so that there is no objection on the part of the governor of the Canal Zone nor on the part of the Secretary of War or on the part of the President.

Mr. GARD. Is it the contention of those who have investigated the legal aspects of the matter that it can not be cured by a rescinding of the Executive order of December 5, 1912, either whole or in part?

Mr. DENISON. Gov. Harding has stated that he has submitted that question to his legal advisers, and that it can not be done in that way.

Mr. GARD. Although the Executive order was made, it is contended that a succeeding Executive can not revoke that order, but relief must come from Congress?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Did they first ask for relief in that way?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, can the gentleman tell whether the Canal authorities affirmatively stated that they have no objections or did they simply fail to register a protest?

Mr. DENISON. Gov. Harding says, in a letter, as follows:

THE PANAMA CANAL,
Balboa Heights, Canal Zone, May 17, 1919.

Mr. CLINTON G. CARTY,
Chairman Purchase Committee,
Sojourners Lodge, A. F. and A. M., Cristobal, Canal Zone.

SIR: Replying to your letter of the 15th instant, in which you ask me to advise whether or not the local authorities have objection to the transfer of the Masonic Temple Building in Cristobal, Canal Zone, to the Sojourners Lodge, A. F. and A. M., I have to advise you that there is no objection except the legal one of lack of authority, in view of the taking over by the Government of all property within the limits of the Canal Zone by the Executive order of December 5, 1912. I am advised that the requisite authority is obtainable only as a result of congressional legislation.

Respectfully, CHESTER HARDING, Governor.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. DENISON. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following tract of land situated within the Canal Zone, and more particularly described as lots Nos. 641, 643, 645, and 647, in the town of Cristobal, Canal Zone, the same being bounded on the north by Eleventh Street, on the east by Bolivar Street, on the south by lot No. 649, and on the west by a vacant lot, the said lots or tract of land having an extension from north to south of 120 feet and from east to west of 100 feet, and measuring in superficial area 12,000 square feet, be, and the same is hereby, withdrawn from the operation and effect of the act of Congress approved August 24, 1912, known as the Panama Canal act (37 Stat., chap. 390, p. 565), and the subsequent Executive order of the President, issue pursuant to the said act of Congress under date of December 5, 1912.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I notice a typographical error in line 9, page 2, of the bill, and I move that that line be amended by adding the letter "d" to the word "issue," so that it will read "issued" instead of "issue."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. WALSH. The right way to amend it is to strike out the one word and insert the other.

Mr. DENISON. This is the same thing.

Mr. WALSH. No; it is not.

Mr. DENISON. Then, in order to please my friend from Massachusetts, I move to strike out the word "issue" and insert in lieu thereof the word "issued."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 9, strike out the word "issue" and insert the word "issued."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. DENISON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. WALSH. The next bill has not been on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent three days.

BRIDGE ACROSS WHITE RIVER, FORSYTH, MO.

The SPEAKER. The next bill in order is Calendar No. 23, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 6692) to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the White River at or near Forsyth, Mo.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, has the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAYS] received the information that I asked for some time ago?

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, I have obtained the original bill, passed on April 8, 1918, and having examined it I am able to state to the gentleman that this is not a toll bridge.

Mr. GARD. Can the gentleman state if it is a necessary public improvement in his district, and if this extension is necessary?

Mr. PAIGE. That is the fact, as I am advised by the people having charge of the matter.

Mr. GARD. I have no objection, in view of the gentleman's statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge authorized by the act of Congress approved April 8, 1918, to be built across the White River at or near Forsyth, Mo., are hereby extended one year and three years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendment:

In lines 5 and 6, after the word "built," insert the words "by the Forsyth special road district of Taney County, Mo."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PAIGE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SHIPPING BOARD INVESTIGATION.

The SPEAKER announced as the special committee to investigate the Shipping Board Mr. WALSH, Mr. KELLEY of Michigan, Mr. HADLEY, Mr. FOSTER, Mr. STEELE, and Mr. CONNALLY.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Oklahoma this afternoon the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. RICKETTS], one of the most efficient Members of the House, be allowed 30 minutes in which to address the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Oklahoma to-day the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. RICKETTS] have 30 minutes in which to address the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE RAILROADS.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] is recognized for one hour. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I would not occupy the attention of the House at this time were it not for the fact that, in my opinion, the matter about which I am to address you is one of very great importance to the people of this country.

While the railroads are under Government control the rate-fixing power is vested in the President of the United States. Through the President orders have been issued, putting into effect freight rates that very greatly discriminate against American industry, American manufacturers, and agricultural products; and I will very largely confine my remarks to that subject.

The Nation has been passing through a period when the demand for nearly every product of the farm and factory has greatly exceeded the supply. A man with nearly anything for sale could sell at a profit. There was comparatively little competition. We are now approching a time when supply may exceed demand. The different nations of the world will compete for markets for their products; they will seek to obtain an advantage for their products over products other nations may have to sell. During the war a number of very important industries came into existence in the United States, and with threatened competition from abroad many of these new industries are now face to face with a crisis. Few men will deny that these new industries are worthy of every encouragement and consideration at this time, but while many propositions are being discussed to foster American industries, and especially the so-called war industries, the administration has published an order reducing transcontinental freight rates on import commodities without giving a corresponding reduction in the domestic rates. The new rate became effective May 29. Let me say to the gentlemen of the House that the freight rates affect shipments into all States east of the Rocky Mountains. Eight Western States are not included, and the lowered rates are on all imports from points west of the Pacific coast and from South America and Mexico on goods coming into this country on the Pacific coast and shipped east. To my mind, this is indeed a great injustice to our own producers. Under the new import rate, for instance, porcelain ware can be shipped from San Francisco to New York for $1.50 per hundred pounds. The former rate was $1.87½. The so-called "chemical porcelain" industry in the United States was built up during the war when such porcelain products could not be obtained from abroad. It is a very important industry because it produces an article very essential to other industries in this country. The industry is now beginning to feel the effects of competition from Japan, and the lowering of freight rates on transcontinental shipments of porcelain ware from Japan operates as a hardship on the domestic industry right at a time when the industry needs assistance; and we are discussing means of assisting it. Knowingly, the Railway Administration has played into the hands of the importer. A few days ago I received a letter from the editor of the Journal of Industrial and Engineering Chemistry and following is an extract of what he has to say about chemical porcelain:

At the outbreak of the war all of our laboratories, educational and industrial, were seriously handicapped by the shortage of porcelain ware, due to the blockade, which prevented the customary importations of Royal Berlin porcelain ware. In response to urgent demands, potteries in Ohio and Colorado began this line of manufacture, and have succeeded in developing a fine line of porcelain, which all agree is the equal of anything ever imported from Germany. Our potteries have fully met the situation, both as to quality and quantity needed. At the same time the Japanese have also developed a fine line of porcelain, and our manufacturers are now faced with the necessity of meeting competition from Japan.

Referring to this competition from Japan, the editor adds:

This has become all the more acute now, in view of the recent decision of the Railroad Administration in reducing rates from the Pacific coast on imports.

If adequate protective tariff measures were on our statute books, the lowering of freight rates on imported articles would not be such a serious matter, but coming at this time, from the viewpoint of the domestic producer competing with goods imported from Japan and the Orient in general, it is insult added to injury. During the war great interest was professed in the establishment of domestic "potash industry." This is another "key" industry upon which Germany had a monopoly. It required a war to wake us up. A large sum of money was invested to develop fields of potash salts in America, and I am now advised that generally speaking the domestic potash producers are closed down. Will we forget and again become dependent upon European potash salts? I have a copy of a circular letter, dated May 31, sent out by H. J. Baker & Bros., of New York. They say:

As sole sales agents for the distribution of all Alsatian potash in the United States, we solicit opportunity of figuring with you, either direct or through our branch offices, on your present and future requirements.

I do not know that the recent reduction in import freight rates has any direct bearing on the potash industry, but I call your attention to the potash industry as evidence that predictions of after-the-war competition are becoming realities. We have promised aid to these so-called war industries, and the time is ripe for action. It is our duty to evince our good faith by protecting these industries from ruinous importations before they have been crushed out of existence; and the letter from the New York sales agent is good proof of the alertness of foreign producers.

Not only is this a matter of importance to the manufacturer, but it also concerns the taxpayers of the country who are called upon to pay almost unbelievable sums to make good the losses sustained by the railroads during the time they have been under the control of the Government. Very recently the Director General of Railroads published a statement to the effect that $1,200,000,000 was needed to pay losses sustained by the Government in the operation of the railroads during the year 1918 and the first four months of 1919; and it must be remembered that this $1,200,000,000 is in addition to $500,000,000 already expended by the Railroad Administration and some $800,000,000 paid by the people since June 10, 1918, in increased passenger fares and freight rates. This last item of expense paid by the people the Director General failed to mention.

I have a copy of Interstate Commerce Commission 1057, in which the new freight rates on import articles are published. This shows the list of goods affected by the new rates. The letter "R" before a rate indicates a reduction. It will be noted that there are few rates enumerated where that letter "R" is missing. For the information of Members of Congress and others who desire to know what has been done and the scope of this new order, I ask that it be printed as a part of my remarks.

The section of the act of Congress which gives the President the power to do just what the Director General of Railroads is now doing, by direction of the President, reads as follows:

That during the period of Federal control, whenever in his opinion the public interest requires, the President may initiate rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, and practices, by filing the same with the Interstate Commerce Commission, which said rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, and practices shall be suspended by the commission pending final determination. Said rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, and practices shall be reasonable and just, and shall take effect at such time and upon such notices as he may direct.

And so forth.

I have here a statement showing existing rates on domestic-made goods from the Pacific coast east, and the freight rates on imported articles coming into the Pacific coast, upon which I am going to comment at this point.

First, let me say that I asked the representatives of the Railroad Administration why they lowered the rates on imported goods but did not lower them on domestic goods between the same points over the same route. The reply was that the importers asked it. I then asked, "How about the manufacturers in this country?" I was told that they were not consulted.

The chief reason given by the Railway Administration was that they wished to equalize the rates between the Orient and, say, Chicago, Cincinnati, and Indianapolis, where the shipments were all water to the Pacific coast and then freighted from the Pacific coast to those points, as compared with all water from the Orient through the canal to New York or other Atlantic seaports, and then by rail freight to Chicago, Cincinnati, and Indianapolis. They wished to equalize these rates, and pointed out that the freight rates across the country from the Pacific coast, coupled with water rates across the ocean, were $2 per ton greater than that by all water to the Atlantic coast plus railway freight rates to Chicago, Cincinnati, and Indianapolis.

I call your attention to the fact that ships going through the Panama Canal pay $1.25 or $1.30 toll per ton of the net tonnage of that ship, and I am not sure but the gross tonnage. Therefore the difference in freight rates to the Atlantic coast is $2, and of this amount $1.25 is absorbed by the toll through the Panama Canal, leaving 75 cents per ton more to the ships carrying goods from the Orient to New York through the Panama Canal than the ships would receive from the Orient to San Francisco.

The rate on a cargo of lumber recently shipped from Grays Harbor, Aberdeen, Wash., to Australia was $52 per thousand feet. A thousand feet of lumber weighs about a ton and a half in round numbers. Therefore the freight from Grays Harbor, Aberdeen, Wash., to Australia is, in round numbers, $38 or $39 per ton. The Railroad Administration would have us believe that the Japanese ships would go all the way around the Pacific coast, through the canal to the Atlantic coast, for the saving of 70 cents a ton. It is folly to suppose any such thing.

I will quote a few of the rates issued in the order which I will publish in the RECORD. There are 483 items in this order on which the freight rates are reduced from the Pacific coast east, and here are some of the reductions:

For instance, on coffee, which is not a competitive product and does not injure our domestic institutions, the freight rate is reduced from $2.37½ per hundred pounds to 80 cents per hundred pounds.

Hair, human hair to a large extent, is reduced from $3.31 to $1.87 per hundred pounds.

Eggs, which rate does affect a domestic product, reduced from $4.62½ to $2. In other words, the imported article pays $2 per hundred pounds freight while the domestic pays $4.62½.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If that is so, if the freight-rate reductions are permitted by the Railroad Administration, would it not have the effect, so far as the Asiatic trade is concerned, to actually nullify the tariff bars that we might erect to protect us against lower-priced articles?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; and I am going to comment on that very point soon.

Further, on flags—and we receive many flags from Japan, although flags are made in this country—the former rate was $9.25 per hundred pounds. It is now reduced to $3.25 a hundred pounds. American-made flags must still pay $9.25 a hundred pounds, a reduction of 66 per cent on foreign-made flags.

The rate on domestic furniture from the Pacific coast is $13.87½ per hundred pounds. The rate on imported furniture is $3, a reduction of 79 per cent.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman explain how American flags, flags not made in America, are imported from Japan?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will say to the gentleman that we have imported many American flags made in Japan, and until a few years ago we imported all flags used in this country. Flags were not made in this country at all until a few years ago.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Is it not rather a technical criticism, when you refer to the reduction of rates on imported flags? Are there any flags made in the Pacific coast States to be shipped to the Atlantic States?

Mr. FORDNEY. Whether there are or not they are made somewhere in the United States, and the rates at all points going east are greater on the domestic goods than on the foreign goods.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I am speaking simply of flags.

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know how many are made on the Pacific coast. Whether they are made there or not, it would not tend to encourage an industry in this country if we charge more freight on domestic articles than on those imported.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Is not the real effect of the reduction in freight rates on imported flags to the East simply to reduce the difference between the highly-taxed importations and those manufactured in the East?

Mr. FORDNEY. I mentioned flags as one of the 483 items on which reductions are made. Then comes furniture. Furniture is made on the Pacific coast, and I have given you the difference, $13.87½ on domestic goods and $3 on imported goods. Is there any reason why these rates should be different from those on domestic articles?

Next, take glassware of every description, except lamp chimneys and the like. The rate is $2.81 on the domestic article and $1.50 on the imported article.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; but I will ask the gentleman not to take any more time than he can help.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Are not these rates he speaks of rates on articles upon which there is not any competition between the Pacific and Atlantic coasts?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, bless your soul, this list covers groceries, provisions of every description, every conceivable thing that can be included within 483 items of imports. I am only reading them as I come to them, and I read but very few of them because my time is limited. I shall print the rates with my remarks. Those that I have referred to are the extremes.

There were imported into this country last year, the calendar year of 1918, 1,000,000,000 pounds of vegetable oil, 710,000,000 pounds of coconut, cottonseed, and soy-bean oil. The soy-bean oil is a great product of this country, as well as is cottonseed oil. California produces more soy beans than all of the rest of the States in the Union. Therefore it is a direct discrimination against the soy bean and the soy-bean oil from the Pacific coast coming east. The freight rates have been lowered from $1.12½ a hundred pounds to 90 cents per hundred pounds. The duty on soy-bean oil is 1 cent a pound. Therefore this reduction is 22½ cents per hundred pounds, which is equivalent to a reduction of the duty on soy-bean oil from 1 cent to 0.77½ cent per pound. This oil comes in competition with cottonseed oil of the South, one of the predominating products of the South. Whether the 22½ cents on a hundred pounds is absorbed by the foreigner or not, here is the situation: If the Japanese and Chinese do reduce their price 22½ cents per hundred pounds, then the consumers of this country receive the benefit, but the manufacturers of cottonseed oil must meet that price, because those oils are competitive oils in the production of several articles of food—butterine, lard, cottoline, and so forth. Therefore if the consumer receives the benefit of that reduction the taxpayer, who is the consumer of the country, must make good the loss to the railroads. On the other hand, suppose the Japanese and the Chinese do not reduce the price of their oil; that, then, does not affect the value of that competitive oil in this country, and the consumer is not benefited, and he must still pay in taxes the loss to the Government-controlled railroad, which loss is very great. Down to the present time it averages about $190,000,000 a month.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Did this condition relative to the difference in freight rates on domestic and imported articles apply or was it in evidence at any time before we had Government control of railroads?

Mr. FORDNEY. The rates were practically the same; on a few articles they were lower on the imported articles than on the domestic products. As a rule, however, they were the same on domestic goods and foreign goods. These reductions were made effective on May 29, 1919.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Was that due to an Interstate Commerce Commission regulation or to the railroads themselves?

Mr. FORDNEY. I can not tell you.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me to answer the question?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I remember a very interesting and able speech by a gentleman, Mr. Kennedy, from Ohio, many years ago, in which he showed that the combined water and rail rates on imported pottery in this country was much less than on domestic pottery. Mr. Kennedy in that speech showed that it was a general practice of the railroads under private control to charge lower rates on imported than on domestic goods.

Mr. FORDNEY. On these articles I am talking about, if the gentleman will not occupy too much of my time, they were equal, but now they are different. Now, I have taken the pains to find out how many ships from the Orient—from Japan and China—entered Atlantic ports since the war—or, in other words, since the beginning of 1914, four and a half years—and I find there were only 77, and they were ships averaging less than 3,500 gross tons, therefore chiefly sailing vessels of small size. So that to equalize rates between the Pacific coast and the Atlantic coast is no real safe or sound argument, because the amount of goods coming into the Atlantic coast from the Orient is so small that it is not necessary to figure them in, only one ship arriving about every four weeks.

Gentlemen, I have a consular report here from an American consul. I will not take up the time of the House to read it all, but I want to call your attention to another matter first. For every 77 cents of increased revenue of the railroads since the Government took control we have spent $1.23. If that is not extravagance, or rather incompetence, I do not know what it is.

Mr. YATES. Will the gentleman repeat that statement?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir. Since the Government took control of the railoads, for every 77 cents collected in revenue above the former revenues it has spent $1.23 to get it.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Who spent that?

Mr. FORDNEY. The Government. The operation of the roads has cost $1.23 to gain 77 cents. Now, America's consul, A. A. Williams, on May 26 makes the following report in the commerce report:

The fat shortage in America gave rise to a greater demand than ever for bean oil, which was sent in a steady stream across the Pacific, chiefly to Seattle.

He goes on further on page 9:

The outstanding features of the exports in 1917 was the great business in soya-bean oils done with America. But, on the other hand, the tremendous growth of industry in America is sure to bring about changes that will result advantageously for the crushers here. The increased oil trade was responsible for tremendous activities on the part of the mills in Dairen and brought prosperity where otherwise a stagnant condition would have obtained.

I picked up a Seattle paper of July 13, and on page 27 of the Post-Intelligencer here is an article. I have not the time to read it, but I will insert it in the RECORD here:

SEATTLE TO SHIP 400 CARS OF OIL TO EAST IN JULY—ORIENT STEAMERS TO UNLOAD 3,200,000 GALLONS THIS MONTH—VOLUME INCREASING.

More than 3,000,000 gallons of vegetable oils will have been shipped through Seattle docks on tank cars and sent to eastern factories before the expiration of the present month.

This grand total, estimated Saturday by officials of the Rogers Brown Co., Seattle's largest oil importers, marks the high point of Seattle's oil activity during the present season. The month of June witnessed a great revival of oil shipping; the present month is largely showing an increase in the volume of incoming oils, while the activity will continue over August.

The estimated grand totals of vegetable oils to be shipped from Seattle this month represents 400 tank cars, or 3,200,000 gallons. Included in this quantity is a trainload and a half of peanut oils, which represents one of the largest supplies of peanut oil ever assembled on the local docks.

A remarkable feature of this great quantity of oil received in Seattle from the Orient via Japanese steamers is the fact that practically the entire supply was sold before it was shipped from the Far East to this port. There are practically no oils in storage in Seattle at this time and the 400 oil cars to be shipped out of Seattle in July go direct to consumers in the East, where the product will be manufactured into lard compounds, lubricating oils, soaps, and tanning ingredients.

Seattle is destined to continue its lead as the Nation's foremost oil-importing center. Oil importing is an established industry here and Seattle's close proximity to the Orient is one of the strongest factors of the remarkable development of the industry in this city. Seattle has better facilities for handling oils than San Francisco, New York, Liverpool, or any other port in the world. Another big advantage is the local facilities for storing oil, which allows purchasers to store their product here, if desired, and avoid leakage, which is a dead loss.

Seattle's big oil-importing district, the East Waterway & Warehouse Co.'s wharves, owned and operated by the Rogers Brown Co., represented a scene of record activity last week. An immense quantity of oil was discharged from the Taiyu Maru. Other oil-laden steamers will be at the East Waterway berth during this and next month in increasing numbers.

This article goes to show the extraordinary importation of vegetable oils from the Orient at the port of Seattle, 400 carloads a month increase. These oils are coming here very largely because of the reduced freight rates on these goods below the freight rates on domestic goods. I read to you the law that gave to the President of the United States the power to fix rates. No power is given by law in this matter to anybody except that delegated by the President to the Director General of Railroads to lower those rates, and I ask you if to reduce rates on imported articles below the freight rates charged on the domestic article between the same ports is equitable and just to the people of the United States whom the President of the United States is supposed to represent—he is our general manager of railroads. If you were a manufacturer and employed a superintendent to run your cotton or woolen mills or any other industry, and you found out he was discriminating against you and in favor of your competitor, what would you do? Would you raise his wages? No; you would raise him from his seat as superintendent of your property and immediately discharge him; that is what you would do. Yet the President of the United States is the superintendent of the railroads, representing the people of the United States. He has discriminated against his own people in favor of the people of Japan, China, South America, and Mexico. There is no question about it. Did he act in a manner just and equitable in that discriminaton? I can not say that he did.

If a corresponding reduction in domestic freight rates is not contemplated at this time—and surely the railroads need all the revenue they are now receiving—it appears to me that these rates on eastbound imported articles are not fair and just, for many of the articles from the Orient, South America, and Mexico, favored by the new rates, come in direct competition with domestic goods.

To build up German industries and encourage export trade it was the policy of the German Government to favor articles intended for export by granting liberal concessions in freight rates from manufacturing centers to the seaports. Such rates were considerably below those charged on imported articles from the seaports to inland points of consumption. How different this is from the policy that is now being followed by our Government. The administration is favoring the imported article at the expense of our own industries. It convinces me, my friends, that when American industries are placed at the mercy of free traders they stand but little chance of success.

The war served to save our industries from the threatening competition from abroad that the Underwood tariff law invited. Normal times are returning and we must now open our eyes to the fact that increased competition from abroad will have to be faced, and right at this time I wish to register emphatically my disapproval of the recent action of the Railroad Administration in putting into effect new rates which can not help but add to the difficulties confronting a large number of important American industries, as well as the railroads that carry these goods.

To reduce freight rates from the Pacific coast to eastern points on oriental goods coming into this country and not to give a corresponding reduction in freight rates on domestic goods between the same points is a clear and unwarranted discrimination against the American product and must work a hardship upon the American laboring man. In my opinion no discrimination could be practiced that would work a greater or more direct hardship on our people than this very act of the administration.

As a further proof of discrimination—because these imports are the products of oriental labor—I wish to quote here some items of wages paid in Japan for various kinds of employment during the year 1916—a war period, if you will remember, and not a prewar period. These quotations are taken from the American Economist, and will be found on pages 1 and 246 of the issue of that paper of December 13, 1918.

The Economist shows that the total number of factories in operation in 1916 in Japan was 19,299, with 1,095,301 employees, of which number there were 458,632 males and 636,669 females. For every two males employed there are about three females, and the average wage scale for females is about 20 per cent below that of males. There were 240 cotton factories in Japan, with 130,000 employees, and in 1918 300 mills, with 170,000 employees, and the average wage scale is from 9½ cents to 24 cents per day for males and from 12½ to 16 cents for females. Wages in the Government departments are from 26½ to 45 cents per day. Agricultural laborers under contract receive, males, $52 per year; females, $30 per year. The average daily wages for these farm laborers is from 30 to 48 cents.

Japanese tailors receive from 69 to 87 cents per day; confectioners, 48 cents per day; carpenters, 42½ cents per day; stonecutters, 50 cents per day; tile roofers, 51 cents per day; bricklayers, 53½ cents per day; ship carpenters, 35 to 43 cents per day; jewelers, 34½ cents per day; first-class blacksmiths, 37½ cents per day; potters, 34 cents per day; paper makers, 24 cents per day; printers, 28 cents per day.

A laborer in Japan, on a monthly contract, receives the enormous sum of $5.14 if male and $3.17 if female, for a whole month's work.

These are the wages that are paid to laborers in Japan who produce articles that come into this country in competition with like articles made by American laborers, who receive a living scale of wages. Do the gentlemen in Congress believe we can lift up the Japanese to the standard of life and living enjoyed by American laborers, or do we expect to bring down the American standard of laborers to that of the Japanese? There is only one safeguard against a reduction of American wages to a lower level, to the level of the labor competitor across the sea, and that is in a protective tariff. [Applause on the Republican side.]

And these goods from China and Japan, my friends, come in competition with the American goods made at the American scale of wages—a living scale—and they include goods produced by child labor. Our laws now exclude the shipment of goods from one State to another produced by child labor, but our import laws do not discriminate against goods made by child labor in a foreign country when imported. That is an injustice to our manufacturers and our producers.

If the manufacturers and producers of the United States hope to enter the world's markets and capture a large portion of the foreign trade of other nations, competitors of ours, the American scale of wages must drop; there is no escape from it. If the people of the United States, right in our own markets, expect to hold their own against the competition of foreign industry, of cheap labor in Japan and other foreign countries, they must put up the bars let down by our Democratic friends and keep out to a large extent the cheaply made products of the foreign lands. If American labor expects to maintain its present high scale of wages or the wage scale which existed in normal times, the laboring man of this country must do everything in his power to help restore the protective tariff system, which heretofore has proven so beneficial to him; it is his only salvation.

With the low rate of duties existing on foreign imports, with the low scale of wages existing in the oriental countries, and with in addition the cruel, discriminating freight rates put into effect recently on oriental goods coming into the United States on the Pacific coast to be shipped to points east of the Rocky Mountains—a rate from 20 per cent to 60 per cent below that enjoyed by domestic goods—who can say that the American laboring man has been given a fair show by the present administration? Is it not true that no act on the part of the administration is a greater discrimination against American laborers than that which first fixes a low rate of duty on oriental imports, bringing in competition with our products the goods of foreign countries made by such poorly paid laborers, and especially child labor, and then fixes a freight rate on foreign goods so far below the rate charged on domestic goods going between the same points in this country? It would seem that those responsible for these discriminations are working in favor of oriental laborers and against the American laborer, for nearly every article produced in the Orient and exported to the United States is benefited by these lower rates.

Our marine laws are so unfavorable to the maintenance of an American merchant marine operating under an American flag that our merchant marine before the war had been practically driven from the high seas, and the ships flying the American flag engaged in our merchant marine at the present time have been built at three times the normal cost and many times the cost per ton of those built in Japan and Europe. While we have many ships to-day, they are being operated at an enormous cost to the Government, which cost is being paid by the people in taxes. We can not successfully maintain a merchant marine under existing marine laws. This industry must and will fail from a financial standpoint. We have established a merchant marine under the Stars and Stripes, and any attempt to maintain it by Government ownership and operation is the act of an insane man. There must first be radical changes in our shipping laws. The world laughs at us in our attempt to operate a merchant marine under the present laws and at the same time expect any financial success.

While we have but one-seventeenth of the world's population, we boast of having one-fourth of the entire wealth of the world. Will the people of the United States now deliberately throw away our impregnable financial and great industrial strength and substitute financial and industrial weakness?

We are great in our financial strength; we have boundless resources. The world recognizes our ability in every line of industry carried on in the United States. The world knows that our energy and capital have built up 60 per cent of the railroad mileage of the world ,and that we have provided agricultural and manufactured products for their maintenance, and the world knows that our people have billions deposited in the savings banks. The world also knows that luxuries are common with our laboring classes.

To continue this national capacity, to overcome obstacles, and to succeed, wages must be kept up.

The American market in all its phases and conditions belongs to the American people, and no Congress that is really patriotic will attempt to deport American capital, destroy American industry, curtail American production, and reduce American wages just to foster some delusive idea of cheapness, which will never come until unemployment impairs the ability of the people to buy. [Applause on the Republican side.]

No nation in the world gets rich by purchasing abroad. A nation, like an individual, gets rich by selling. Our own people are our best customers. Why not sell to them? Why give our markets to foreigners, while we neglect employment for our own people? [Applause on the Republican side.] But the "low-tariff advocates" can see no prosperity for the country except through foreign trade.

For more than 100 years, without an exception in normal times, with no counteracting influences, customs duties too low to insure American productions have always increased the imports. Under these conditions the balance of trade turns against the country and unemployment becomes general.

All the principal nations of the world except the United States are establishing tariff laws to increase their own industries, and all are expecting the rich American people to buy their products, while we, with the temerity of theorists, invite their competition.

The administration is aiding foreign imports by reducing freight rates from the Pacific coast to eastern points on imported goods, but making no reduction in freight rates on domestic goods between the same points. Not a dollar is being spent by this Government at this time to encourage our industries and American labor, but millions are being spent in an extravagant, unwarranted manner in many directions.

Gentlemen, the increased revenues of the Government on passenger and freight rates, taken from the volume of money collected on freight and passenger fares before the war, is in round numbers identical with the percentage of increased rates. In 1916 the freight collected by the railroads was, in round numbers, $2,400,000,000; in 1917, $2,827,000,000; and in 1918, $3,034,000,000. Therefore I say that the extra freight paid by the American people and the extra passenger fare paid by the people that have traveled since the 14th day of June of last year is a tax upon the people, put it as you may. It is a loss being made up for the mismanagement of the railroads. It has been stated that the freight carried by the railroads during the last 12 months was no greater in volume than the 12 months preceding Government control, and yet there are employed on the railroads 170,000 more men than were employed before the war. There is where our losses are occurring.

I am going to conclude before my hour is up. I want you gentlemen to pay attention to these remarks. I received through the mails the other day a copy of a set of resolutions or declaration of principles adopted by the Republicans of New Jersey in convention, and I think they are worthy of serious consideration. I will quote from those resolutions very largely, as follows:

We have great faith in our American form of government and the principles on which it rests.

Although for 130 years we have maintained this Government—the best government of any country in the world—we have not solved all the difficult problems of the world, nor have we made everybody prosperous and happy, but we have made more progress in that direction than have any other people. Throughout the world, so far, all "isms" have failed—radical socialism, I. W. W.ism, and anarchism must and will fail. We shall resist to the utmost all efforts to change our Republic into an ism form of government.

No man that pulls another down raises anybody up.

Our policies have built a great nation. We are rich in many ways. Twenty millions of our people are purchasers of liberty bonds, with an average of about $1,500 per purchaser.

We have 18,000,000 homes occupied by 21,000,000 families.

We have over 12,000,000 depositors with savings of $7,000,000,000.

We have over 16,000,000 farms yielding annually over $12,000,000,000 worth of agricultural products.

And we have 21,000,000 children attending our schools.

Our schools, churches, parks, playgrounds, hospitals, libraries, and museums are for the use of all classes. This is the kind of socialism preached and practiced by the English-speaking people of the world, of whom we are the predominant part.

This form of government is so popular that since 1620 there has been a growth in the population from about 100 men, women, and children to 107,000,000 and so prosperous that while we have but one-seventeenth of the world's population we boast of having 25 per cent of the world's wealth.

This is a Republic worth saving; and we pledge to it our loyalty, and we will oppose to the extreme autocratic, rabid socialism, I. W. W.ism, Bolshevism, and anarchism We stand for law and order. We will oppose that class that would, for the purpose of securing their demands, destroy human life and property.

We welcome the honest sons of other lands who will cooperate with us, support our institutions, and help to better our civilization; but we insist upon their unqualified loyalty to the land of their adoption and their allegiance to but one country and but one flag, that country America and that flag the Stars and Stripes.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

We favor restrictive laws, without denying free speech, that will forbid incendiary utterances calculated to destroy our Government institutions. We are opposed to bombs, whether thrown by the hand or by the mouth.

Every immigrant should be normal, mentally and physically. Criminals and those whose views are un-American and tend to the destruction of our institutions should be refused admission, and, if already admitted, should be deported.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield before he concludes?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask permission to make a little statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks permission to make a statement.

Mr. HARDY or Texas. I first wish to ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the list of freight rates put into effect May 29 last.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield to a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. FESS. I have looked over the disbursements of the Government for this month as reported in the daily report coming from the Treasury, and I find that the disbursements this month are a little over $2,000,000,000, a good portion of which is, of course, for the retirement of some of the short-term certificates. Did the gentleman go into the question of the source of revenue by which we are going to take care of this terrific charge?

Mr. FORDNEY. I did not, but I can in a minute's time tell you the situation. I have in my possession——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, for two minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more in order to answer a question. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have it made five minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Thank you. I have in my possession a letter from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue giving, as correctly as he can give it at this time, the estimated amount of revenue under our internal-revenue laws that will be collected this year. It is a fraction below the estimated amount at the time the bill became a law, $4,000,000,000. I have been told from several sources that our expenditures this year will reach nearly $7,000,000,000. Therefore, we must sell bonds, already authorized but not yet disposed of, to make up the difference between the revenues that will be collected this year and the amount of our expenditures. I believe it was intended last year to provide for the sale of Government bonds, Treasury notes, and Treasury certificates to an amount sufficient to make up the difference. To the $4,000,000,000 estimated that this law will yield must be added many miscellaneous taxes, about $170,000,000 of import duties and other miscellaneous revenue, and they will not reach more than $5,000,000,000 as revenue of the Government this year. Therefore we must sell, if the estimates are correct, something like $2,000,000,000 of bonds to make up the expenditures of the Government over and above the taxes that will be collected.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. If I have the time.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. How does the actual cash in the Treasury compare with the volume of outstanding warrants?

Mr. FORDNEY. I can hardly tell the gentleman that, but I will print with my remarks, if the House will give me permission, a statement furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury as to the amount of outstanding Government obligations on July 1.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. The statement received to-day, as I recall it, showed that warrants have been issued already in excess of the total cash, of over $900,000,000, and that about one week ago the outstanding warrants exceeded the total cash by $1,120,000,000.

Mr. FORDNEY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. Would it embarrass the gentleman if I asked him one question?

Mr. FORDNEY. Not at all.

Mr. FESS. What proportion of the circulation medium to-day would be regarded as fiat?

Mr. FORDNEY. I can hardly tell, but during the war there was about $1,500,000,000 of inflated currency put out through the Federal reserve bank. That is being called in very rapidly, I am told, and destroyed. What portion of that $1,500,000,000 is outstanding at the present time I am unable to say, but I will venture to say that not over $1,000,000,000. The way that was issued was this: Under former laws for every dollar of gold certificates outstanding there were 100 cents of gold coin and gold bullion in the United States Treasury. The Federal reserve bank collected the gold certificates, turned them in and demanded gold, and then under the Federal reserve banking laws turned back that gold and received $2.50 of Federal reserve bank notes for each dollar of gold. Therefore about $1,000,000,000 have been called in, which gave $1,500,000,000 of inflated currency.

Mr. FESS. If this retirement is gradual, it ought to stabilize prices and bring down the cost of living, ought it not?

Mr. FORDNEY. I would think so; yes. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will insert here the list of freight rates on imports entering the Pacific coast.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous arrangement of the House certain Members were allotted time.

Mr. FORDNEY. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to extend and revise my remarks. I have some statistics that I want to include.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting certain tables and figures referred to in his address. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] can not be recognized at the present time. Under previous arrangements the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, the many comments on the conduct of the Great War made upon this floor, bearing upon the lack of efficiency and economy with which the war was conducted, lead me to call attention to some phases of the matter which, though quite apparent, seem to have received but little attention.

Gentlemen who speak of lack of "efficiency" in the effective conduct of any enterprise should remember that the term "efficiency" is a relative term. A thing is efficiently done when it is done as well as anyone else could have done it under like circumstances. A thing is efficiently done when it is done as effectively as anyone else has succeeded in doing the same thing before. When improved methods and the advance of science make possible the doing of things more quickly and more effectively than they could be done in former times, then the former manner of doing things must give way to the advanced efficiency of a new age. But when a thing is done as well as anyone could do it at the time it is done and under the circumstances in which it is done, then that thing is efficiently done.

The word "extravagance," which has been repeatedly and idly applied to the handling of vast war funds in the World War, is likewise a relative term. A thing is extravagantly done when it is done at a cost exceeding that at which some one else, under like conditions, could have done it. It is economically accomplished when it is accomplished at an expense not exceeding that at which anyone else could have accomplished it. It is accomplished economically when for every dollar spent a dollar's worth of return has been realized, gauged by the returns possible on the dollars spent in the day and time of the undertaking and compared with the returns received on the dollars spent in previous undertakings of the same character.

Therefore, when gentlemen speak here or elsewhere of "lack of efficiency" in our prosecution of this war, and when they talk of "extravagance" in the expenditure of our moneys, they must expect their statements to be viewed in the light of comparison with other wars and the conduct and expense thereof.

I wonder whether gentlemen who talk of the extravagant waste of money in this war have taken the time and the trouble to compare the recent war expenditures with our expenditures during the Spanish-American War. I wonder whether they have figured the per capita cost of our recent war for each soldier for a period of one year and compared that figure with what it cost us to maintain our soldiers during the Spanish-American War.

In the latter part of April, 1898, war was declared with Spain. On the 11th of April, 1899, the peace treaties were exchanged, and hostilities, actually over some time before, were officially at an end. The period of real fighting occupied only about three months. During the total period of less than one year of official war, approximately $377,000,000 was spent by us in the prosecution of the Spanish-American War, which was fought by our Army of some 278,000 men.

Now, in the matter of totals, no comparison can exist between our War with Spain and our titanic struggle against the Central Empires. But the comparison of totals tells nothing. It is a relative comparison only that can truthfully determine whether our funds have been well spent. And in making a comparison of this nature, many things must be considered. It is necessary to bear in mind the difference between nineteenth century costs of material and twentieth century costs; it is necessary to remember the difference between a strait and an ocean in the matter of transportation; it is necessary to remember that this war has called for munitions and supplies for every man of our Army of a quantity and nature unknown to the world in 1898; and only with these facts in mind is it possible to make a fair comparison.

Bearing them in mind, then, let me call attention to certain parallels between these two wars in the matter of expenses, which will show, I believe, that our present war, with all its tremendous cost, has not been unduly expensive.

In an article recently given wide publicity in the press, and which appeared in the Washington Post of July 10, the estimated cost of the war up to June 30, 1919, was placed by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Glass, in round figures at $21,000,000,000. This is the net cost to us after proper deductions of some nine billions due on loans to the Allies.

Now, compared with this vast total, our expense of some $377,000,000 in the Spanish-American War shrinks to almost nothing. But remember that the war with Germany, up until June 30 of this year, has lasted more than twice as long as the Spanish-American War officially lasted, and call to mind the difference between an army of over 3,000,000 men, with most of them across the seas in France, and an army of 278,000 men, with a portion only of them in Cuba, and this latter figure, in round numbers, our Army of 1898 never exceeded. As the $377,000,000 spent in the Spanish-American War shrinks to practically nothing, so shrinks the Army of that war into a battalion, notwithstanding its glorious achievement and the valor with which it fought.

To maintain this Army of 278,000 men at a cost of $377,000,000 means that the cost per man per year for our one year of war with Spain was about $1,350. From April, 1917, until June 30, 1919, our war with Germany, supporting an army of 3,670,000 men, cost us $21,000,000,000, and the average cost per man per year for our two and a quarter years of war with Germany was about $2,543.

In 1917 and 1918, just 20 years after the Spanish War, when the price of everything had doubled and quadrupled, the price of the war per man was actually held down to a negligible increase over the cost per man in 1898.

We raised, equipped, and transported an army at a cost per man less than 100 per cent greater than it took to do the same thing in 1898, and we raised a better organized army; we equipped it better than we did 20 years ago; we transported it 3,000 miles over hostile seas, where we had to face only a peaceful strait in 1898. And the cost was maintained at a level less than twice the cost per man of the previous war, and we cared for our soldiers better, gave them better food and equipment, gave them more of it, and paid them more money and gave them more benefits than we did during our War with Spain, and gave them more in combined salary and various war benefits, family allowances, insurance privileges, and so forth, than any nation ever gave its fighting men in this or any other war in history. [Applause.]

In 1917 and 1918 men had to be moved across 3,000 miles and more of submarine-infested water; had to be armed, fed, clothed in health and cared for in sickness more than 3,000 miles from home; had to have supplies shipped to them from across the sea; had to have artillery the like of which was never more than dreamed of before; had to have motor trucks, which did not even exist in 1898; had to have ammunition in quantities to stagger the imagination; had to have the means of combating poison gas; had to have clothing suitable for a winter climate, nonexistent in Cuba, and the bitterness of which is unknown in our previous military history—and yet, with all these tremendous handicaps, the men who spent our money kept the cost down to less than double the amount per man spent a score of years ago.

To have fought another war in every particular identical with the Spanish-American War would have been due to cost twice as much in 1918 as it did in 1898 at the lowest possible figure. Yet with the tremendous additional difficulties that had to be faced and mastered, with the crushing burdens of a war against an implacable, inhuman enemy, calling for mountains of equipment and munitions and supplies for every man of our Army, the administration kept the cost per man per year down to less than double the cost per man per year for the skirmish of 1898.

And yet gentlemen talk of extravagance! I wonder if they have succeeded in keeping their personal expenses on as economical a basis as this. I wonder if they could raise an army themselves and, paying the men a salary and providing for them benefits in the way of insurance, compensations, vocational education and rehabilitation, and hospitals, never before made available for a nation's soldiery, maintain the cost of that army at a relative advance some three or four hundred per cent lower than advances in other lines of endeavor? I wonder if they could?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for just a moment?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I think the gentleman has omitted one item in his relation of the cost, namely, that of Air Service amounting to some $800,000,000.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I was just coming to that. I was going to say that in this war of 1917–18 we had to face the problem of organizing from practically nothing the Air Service, which in 1898 had been dreamed of, but never had been heard of, in actual warfare before.

Gentlemen speak of the useless waste which they assert has occurred during this war. I wonder whether these gentlemen can remember at this present date how much was known in the days of the recent fighting as to the probable duration of the war. I wonder when they protest with the feverish vehemence of ignorance as to the thousands spent upon improvements, buildings, and supplies which can not now be used, whether they can remember the days when the wisdom of preparation for a long war was nowhere questioned? If gentlemen of the House knew in 1917 the date at which the war would terminate, then they were sadly derelict in their duty, for they should have informed Congress and the President of their foreknowledge in order that appropriations might have been made accordingly. I wonder whether the hindsight of gentlemen who criticize at this late date the cost of the war may not be better than their foresight?

Look at the official record to be found in Senate Document No. 270 of the first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress, the record of the court of inquiry which, under the direction of President McKinley, investigated the food supply of our Army for the Spanish War, and see, on page 1892 thereof, the court's finding which characterized the handling of the food supply of that war as a "colossal blunder"! Whatever else may have been said by our men returned from overseas as to their hardships, none has yet said, to my knowledge, that inedible, nauseating meat was ever given him for food while in the service of his country in France. Yet many soldiers and officers testified that such a condition did prevail during the Spanish War.

Therefore our food supply was more efficiently handled in our late war than it was in 1898, notwithstanding the fact that the war was 3,000 miles away, as compared with only a few hundred when we fought with Spain.

And by the same comparison our food was economically supplied, because it cost us less than twice as much per man to support our Army in France as it did in Cuba, and food is more than twice as high to-day as it was at that time.

It is impossible to estimate the loss that occurred during the war of 1898 on foodstuffs, because quantities of food, bought and paid for and issued to the men, were simply thrown away and not consumed, being unfit for human consumption. The testimony is of record; anyone may read it who wants to, and will find it in the Senate document of the Fifty-sixth Congress, which I have just referred to. Sometimes large quantities of canned food were issued, and from 20 to 50 per cent of it would be thrown away, and sometimes practically all of it would be thrown away. It was not fit to be eaten.

That, gentlemen, was inefficiency. I lay the blame at the door of no one; it makes no difference to me whose fault it was, it was inefficiency, and it was inefficiency of the rankest kind. There were difficulties to be overcome, and they were not overcome, and our men suffered, and that was inefficiency.

No such inefficiency has been reported or suggested during the present war. If men were not well fed, it was only because and only when they were in front-line trenches or elsewhere where they could not be reached immediately with fresh food. They had plenty to eat where the fighting made it possible to get to them with food, and they had food that was healthy and did not make them sick when they ate it. Our soldiers in the War with Spain sickened and became nauseated with the food that was given them. That was inefficiency, and the handling of our food for the Army in France was efficiency.

In common with millions of other American fathers, I had a boy in France, and I am glad that money was spent and spent freely to assure his safety, to guarantee his comfort, to protect him from disease, to make possible his return home as good a man as he was—yes, a better man than he was—before he answered "Here!" to his country's call. [Applause.]

I am glad that money was spent to insure safety as far as it could be insured, comfort where that was possible, and hospitals where they were needed for our millions of men who took up arms in the cause their deeds now glorify. I am glad that money was spent to eradicate vice conditions around our camps; our sons and our brothers, and their sons and grandsons, and all the future generations will benefit by it, bless the men who did it, and thank the Congress which made available the money with which it was done. [Applause.]

This is not a temporary benefit or a war-time benefit, but the influence is a permanent influence for good that can not be estimated in the longest line of figures in dollars and cents that has ever been written. I am glad that it was done, no matter what it cost. I am glad that unfortunate boys who entered the Army with the marks of vice upon their bodies can come out of it clean and with the marks washed away by the skill of our splendid surgeons who cared for them. I am glad that those of our boys who went into the service clean, and, thank God, they were in a vast majority, can come out again clean. And if this cost money I am glad that money was spent.

No one has accused us of letting our wounded men lie in the mud in France and Belgium because there was nowhere else to take them. They may have lain there sometimes when they could not be reached immediately and transported to the hospitals that were provided for them. But no one has yet said that the hospitals did not take care of them.

That was said during the War with Spain. And it was said under oath, and the testimony is of record in the hearings to which I have already referred. The men, in a place supposed to be a hospital, lay on the ground in the mud. They were wounded men and sick men, and could not help themselves, and they lay there because there was nothing better for them. That, gentlemen, was inefficiency!

And remember, it was inefficiency bought at a price proportionately higher, in view of costs then prevailing, than the price of our splendid efficiency in the handling of our wounded and our sick in France. And it was inefficiency bought at a price that was high when the price ought to have been cheap, because the field was close to home. And our efficiency in France was, and still is, an efficiency bought at a price that ought to be high, but which is really cheap, for our hospitals in France were across the sea, 3,000 miles away.

In our war with Germany, had the death rate from disease been the same as it was in the Spanish-American War, our losses by disease only would have been, from September 1, 1917, to May 2, 1919, over 112,000 men; they were actually less than 50,000. Had the disease rate of the Civil War prevailed during the same period, our deaths from disease would have been over 227,000 men. These are not my estimates; they are the official figures of the Surgeon General of the Army.

The same statistics show that had the malaria death rate of the Spanish-American War prevailed in this war the deaths in the Army during that same period would have been over 11,000; the Civil War death rate would have been 13,900; the deaths from malaria were actually 13!

Had the dysentery death rate of the Spanish-American War prevailed during the war with Germany deaths from dysentery during this same period would have been over 6,000; Civil War standards would have caused deaths of over 63,000; our deaths from dysentery were only 42.

Think of it, gentlemen; think of it! Six thousand deaths from dysentery if Spanish War figures had prevailed; ten times that number if Civil War figures had prevailed; and a total of only two score under the splendid medical service that actually did prevail.

Had we raised the same army during the Civil War that we raised in the war with Germany and maintained it for the same length of time deaths from this one cause alone would have been one thousand five hundred times as many as occurred in this war; had we raised and maintained such an army for a like time during the Spanish War the deaths would have been over one hundred and forty-two times as great. Where 1 man died during the present war from dysentery, 142 died during the Spanish-American War, 1,500 died during the Civil War, and yet gentlemen talk of inefficiency and extravagance! No money could ever pay for such efficiency as this.

The figures are the same right straight through. Only in the matter of pneumonia, due to the sweeping epidemic of influenza, and in the matter of tuberculosis are our present death figures higher than those of the Spanish War. During that war tubercular patients were discharged as soon as their disease was discovered, so that few died in the Army, whereas our tubercular patients are now retained in the hope of curing them. Naturally some of them die, and this fact, coupled with the fact that tuberculosis is harder to contend with in the winter in a cold, wet country like northern France than it is in a sunny country like Cuba in summer, brought our death rate in this particular disease above that of the Spanish-American War.

But even with this handicap the deaths from all diseases combined show a disease loss in the German war of considerably less than half the loss that would have occurred under the standards of efficiency prevailing during the Spanish-American War, and they were only a little over one-fifth the number that would have occurred under Civil War standards.

Mr. LAZARO. The gentleman remembers the high death rate by typhoid in the Spanish-American War?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. That was wiped out practically in this war.

This, gentlemen, is a record of efficiency. And if it costs money to render that kind of efficiency, I, for one, am not sorry to see the money spent. Lives of American boys can not be valued in dollars and cents; they can not be bought with money. Far better to appropriate millions for the well-being of our heroic youth in arms than to have the very doubtful satisfaction in later years of saying that we fought the war cheaply. A cheap bill for the war would be small recompense for any thinning of the ranks of our returning heroes which it was possible to prevent. Gladly we spent the money to keep them and care for them and bring them safely home!

It is true that vast sums of money were spent in this war for equipment and supplies, and it is possibly true that more money was spent than was necessary, owing to the sudden and unexpected end of the struggle. That, of course, could not be foreseen or avoided. Far better to spend the money and have the struggle end with a quantity of supplies on hand than to have it continue and be without munitions and equipment for the fray.

It is actually a fact that during the Spanish-American War there were times when troops were unable to move for lack of proper equipment and supplies. Read the statement of Gen. Nelson A. Miles in the "History of the American-Spanish War," to be found in any library. You will find the same story in the official hearings to which I have referred before. Troops ordered to move on Cuba from Tampa were unable to do so, because they had not the necessary equipment and supplies.

There was money enough spent to have had supplies there, but they were not there.

In this war we spent money enough for supplies, and the supplies were there. There is no extravagance in that, nor is there any lack of efficiency. German submarines may have interfered to some extent with the movement of our troops; transportation facilities for carrying millions of men are not to be built or secured in a day, and this hampered for a time the movement of our troops to France, but I have yet to hear of any movement which was ordered and which failed because there were no supplies to support it.

Remember in this connection that the increase of our Army in the Spanish-American War was an increase to approximately ten times the normal prewar basis, and the increase in the war with Germany was a sudden expansion from normal to over thirty-four times the normal size of our peace force. Therefore we had to face in this war an expansion and a consequent problem in the matter of supplies almost three and a half times as great as the same problem in 1898. Yet the supplies for this vast army were there, the movements went forward steadily; there was no falter, no pause, no break.

That, gentlemen, is efficiency. It is efficiency of a kind unknown in previous military history of this or any other nation, and the gentlemen who speak of any lack of efficiency simply have not studied the question.

After all, what is the purpose of a war? Is it not to defeat your enemy? And can the price of a victory for humanity be estimated in gold?

Germany would have gladly paid billions for a victory, and she was fighting for merely an imperial victory. We were struggling for victory for humanity, and yet gentlemen talk of the expense of this glorious victory as if human lives and the cause of freedom could be valued in yellow coin.

It is not my purpose to disparage in any way the valor of our soldiers in the Spanish-American War of 1898. They fought for a splendid cause in a splendid manner; they acquitted themselves as Americans have always done; and the names of those who fought and died and the names of those who live are dear to us all. I merely bring these comparisons out to show that while they fought with all the fighting efficiency of American men they fought a splendid fight, notwithstanding the inefficiency of the governmental agencies behind them. And had the inefficiency that showed itself in governmental agencies throughout the Spanish-American War been the rule in the war against the German Empire, then the Hun to-day would be triumphantly celebrating his victory over the civilized world.

I do not mean to say that money may not have been spent that might have been saved. I do not mean that prices were not possibly higher than they should have been for some of the supplies purchased. No doubt that will all be investigated and thrashed out. There are always after-the-war investigations.

But what I do contend is that this war has been as economically handled for the results achieved as anyone or any organization or any body or any administration could have handled it. I contend that it was proportionately more economically handled than the War with Spain, and I contend that it was more efficiently handled.

And when a war, compared with the past wars of your country, costs you less, viewed in the light of the standards of the time prevailing, than other wars have cost you; and when the soldiers of democracy go forth better fed and better equipped than the soldiers of other wars; and when they derive benefits never accorded by this or any other nation to its defenders in arms; and when they have thrown their strength into the winning of a wonderful victory for the cause of humanity and have won it, then I contend, and my contention can not be refuted, that the war is a splendid, glorious success; and I contend that the men who directed it and the men who fought it, the men who bought the supplies and the men who transported them, the Congress that made the money available, and the administration in the fighting top that guided the movements of the vast and rushing war machine, all were splendidly, gloriously successful!

I contend that the Great War, besides being a shining achievement in the cause of humanity, was an achievement in efficiency and economy unrivaled in the life of our Nation, and the indisputable evidence of the history of all past wars bears out this assertion.

Our entrance into the World War found us unprepared in every way. We were and are a peace-loving people. Our vast energies had been attuned to the needs of peace, for no one of us thought in warlike terms. But the genius of our people met the needs of the hour. We appropriated billions of dollars, trained millions of men, manufactured mountains of munitions, bridged the Atlantic with our ships, and placed in France millions of the finest fighting men the world has ever seen in a space of time in which our enemies stated only thousands would be available.

Yes, we were all unprepared; but we armed ourselves and hurled our men into the maelstrom of war in a manner that not only astonished the world but caused ourselves to wonder. [Applause.]

America's achievement in the war just ended is the marvel of the ages, and unstinted praise comes from all the world, and the nations that we rescued from the grasp of the Hun stand even to-day amazed at the rapidity of our participation in the struggle. Not a voice is raised in all the world at what we did or how we did it save here at home. The harmony of the chorus of approval of all humanity is marred in its completeness only by the critic in our midst, and his criticism will be lost as the years go by in the universal acclaim accorded the splendid administration that so splendidly handled the splendid resources and splendid men of a splendid people. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HERSEY). The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I am very glad to follow the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS] who has spoken so forcefully about the record of this country in the Great War. I want to speak particularly of the part taken by the State of Illinois in the accomplishment which the gentleman from Louisiana has so eloquently described.

Mr. Speaker, last year there was celebrated by appropriate ceremonies throughout the State of Illinois the one hundredth anniversary of the admission of our State into the Union. In 1818 the greater part of Illinois was almost uninhabited, save by the native Indian tribes; the white population was located largely in those counties in the southern part of the State touching the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, and near Lake Michigan, and at other places that were easily defended and readily accessible by water transportation, which was the only available transportation at that time.

The population of the State then was only 34,620, and upon its admission into the Union Illinois was fortunately and ably represented in the United States Senate by Hon. Jesse B. Thomas and Ninian Edwards, and in this House by John McLean.

The prairies and the woodlands of our State were by nature beautiful, and the soil was as fertile as the valley of the Nile; these with a tempting temperate climate attracted immigration from the very beginning, and within the span of but few years the hunting grounds of the Indians along the navigable rivers, on the picturesque plains, and in the bounteous basins of the Mississippi, Ohio, Illinois, and Wabash Rivers, became the happy homes of hundreds who came north and west to seek their fortunes.

In those days there were two tides of immigration into Illinois. One from Ohio, New York, and New England came by way of the Great Lakes, thence through what is now Chicago and down into the State from the north. The other from Kentucky, Tennessee, and the Carolinas crossed the Ohio and moved up into the State from the south. The two classes coming from widely different and differing sections of the country and bringing with them different habits, different social ideals, and different theories of government met and mingled in Illinois. The desire for a new home in the West and the promise that Illinois offered, brought the sons of the Puritans and the sons of the Cavaliers together, and the North and the South came together there as they did in no other State in the Union.

The different sources of her people and the constant contact and contest within her borders of people with different social and political ideals have even been a wholesome stimulant of political interest and encouragement of patriotic purpose, and from the very beginning have made Illinois one of the greatest political battle fields of the Nation.

This fundamental difference in ideals, resulting in an almost continuous struggle for political supremacy, has by a sort of natural process developed in the people of our State an intense and universal interest in the affairs of state and a partisan and militant spirit in politics.

After something near a half century the great question that had divided the North from the South, the cloud that had been gathering and growing over the Nation, began to rapidly darken and threaten. Statesmen with prevision of its possibilities raised their feeble hands in futile effort to stay it by compromise or truce. The North had its views and declared them. The South had its views and boldly asserted them. But in Illinois the sons of both were face to face, and there, as indeed often since then, the great question so vital to the Nation's life took its final form. It was in the memorable debate between Abraham Lincoln and Stephen A. Douglas in Illinois in 1858 that the people of the country became conscious of the fact that our Nation could not longer remain half slave and half free.

That debate was the final word of the two sides upon the slavery question. The immediate results were true to the fervid fighting spirit that has characterized Illinois politics from that day until this. Douglas carried the State and was elected to the Senate, but a little later Lincoln carried the State and was elected President. There soon followed the specter of civil war, which settled, at the cost of much blood and treasure, the great question which for years divided the thoughts and finally the allegiance of our people. But it was in Illinois that that great question took its final form and was settled, so far as it could be settled in the forum of political discussion.

And that same fighting spirit has characterized the subsequent political history of our State. Whenever in national campaigns the great political parties have met in important conflict, Illinois has been a sort of a political no man's land, where the fighting has been thick and the results decisive.

In the great campaign of 1896, when the doctrine of free coinage of silver swept over the country like a prairie fire, they fought it out in Illinois, and McKinley carried the State by an unusual majority.

In 1904, after an important national campaign, Roosevelt carried the State by an unprecedented majority.

And in 1916, when the issue was "He kept us out of war" and "I did not raise my boy to be a soldier," the people of Illinois showed their fighting spirit by giving Mr. Hughes a majority of about 212,000, the largest by far he received in any State.

And so it has ever been. There are no easy campaigns in Illinois. The Republicans and Democrats are alike red blooded. They are always patriotic, partisan, and posted on politics. There are in our State very few nonpartisans, thank Heaven!

In the war for the preservation of the Union Illinois was one of the first to respond to the call for men. This again was but natural. It was the home of Lincoln. The people knew the issues. They loved Lincoln and believed in his cause. They responded to his call with every man that could shoulder a gun. Before the struggle was over Illinois gave 259,092 men to the cause of the Union. At that time our population was only 1,712,920.

This response was only exceeded by three States, which were much older. New York, with a population of 3,880,595, furnished 448,850 men; Pennsylvania, with a population of 2,906,208, furnished 337,936 men; and Ohio, with a population of 2,339,481, furnished 313,180 men. Illinois furnished more men in excess of her quota than did any other Northern State. She furnished 14,596 more men than her quota, while New York furnished 58,298 less than her quota, and Pennsylvania furnished 47,433 less than her quota, and Ohio but 6,858 more than her quota.

The records show that during the Civil War there were less men paid commutation for military service from Illinois than from any other State except Kansas, which of course furnished comparatively few soldiers. During the entire period of the war there were but 55 from Illinois that paid commutation. There were 28,171 from Pennsylvania, 18,197 from New York, 6,479 from Ohio, 5,318 from Massachusetts, and 2,007 from Maine that did so.

At the first call of President Lincoln, Grant and Logan and many others who later won lasting fame and the gratitude of the Nation responded from Illinois with offers of their services.

Mr. AYRES. At that time Illinois was really a border State, was it not?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. AYRES. Many Illinois families had sons in both armies.

Mr. DENISON. Well, I think that may have been so in some instances.

Mr. AYRES. Many men from Illinois went into the southern army.

Mr. DENISON. Well, there were many that sympathized with the South at the beginning of the war.

And the spirit of those great generals who afterwards did so much to help save the Union cause, with that of President Lincoln, aroused the patriotism of the people of our State and inspired them to a spirit of sacrifice and devotion to the cause of our country that ever remained fixed in their hearts and became a part of their lives and has descended as a heritage to their children and children's children.

And so, Mr. Speaker, when the United States was unhappily drawn into the World War in 1917 the people of Illinois responded with the same enthusiasm and the same spirit of sacrifice and loyalty to our cause. This war has been different, of course, from all other wars in which our country has been involved. I do not refer merely to the difference in magnitude, but the aroused national spirit, indicating the increasing devotion of a reunited people to the institutions and the liberties of our free Government, was magnificent, was an inspiration.

In no other war has our whole people been so entirely united in the support and prosecution of the struggle. America this time fought as one man. The President had no hostile party opposing him in Congress, a fact unheard of before then. He was given freely what he asked. What might not President Lincoln have done had he been so favored?

In no other war was the man power of our entire Nation so completely and so quickly marshaled from the very beginning of the struggle upon the fundamentally fair and equitable principle of the universal duty of service in defense of the flag.

In a year and a half we had over 4,000,000 men in our Army. It took England three years to get 2,000,000 across the Channel into France. We got 2,000,000 men across the Atlantic Ocean and into France in half that time.

In no other war have the wealth and the natural resources of the entire Nation been so completely turned from the pursuits of peace to the processes and prosecution of war. The war cost the United States about $22,000,000,000, or over $1,000,000 an hour for two and a half years. We loaned nearly $10,000,000,000 to our Allies.

In no other war has the spirit of sacrifice been so general among all the people, rich and poor alike.

About 30,000,000 people have purchased the bonds of the Government to pay the expenses of the war. The people have willingly loaned the Government $22,457,134,671 besides paying in taxes since the war began $9,370,224,492.84.

When our armies and our Allies were calling for munitions and supplies our producers and our laborers everywhere responded with a united and increasing effort to supply the demands, and when a hungry world called to us for food and fuel our farmers and our miners responded like soldiers and made the earth bring forth food and fuel more abundantly.

But, Mr. Speaker, my purpose was to speak more particularly of what Illinois contributed toward the prosecution of the war.

The total number of men furnished by Illinois to the land forces of the United States through the draft, the National Guard, and voluntary enlistments was 286,163. The drafted men were sent to Camp Taylor, Camp Grant, Camp Dodge, and many direct to Camp Dix, N. J., where they were rapidly trained into fighting forces and assigned as units in different divisions that went to France and participated in the final struggle. Wherever they were sent they made a splendid record and proved themselves worthy sons and grandsons of those who honored and upheld the Nation's cause at Fort Donaldson, Shiloh, Vicksburg, Atlanta, and Appomattox.

The Illinois National Guard, consisting of 18,439 men and officers, including those who were recruited up to that date, was called into service of the Government August 5, 1917, and was increased by enlistments to 26,631 officers and men. They were mobilized by the Federal Government at Camp Logan, Houston, Tex., and constituted the Thirty-third Division and were commanded by Gen. George Bell, jr.

Under the selective-service law Illinois furnished a total of 1,559,586 registrants subject to the service of the Government.

In addition to the 286,163 men whom Illinois contributed to the United States land force, our State furnished 24,663 men for the Navy and 3,678 men for the Marine Corps, or a total of 28,341 men for the naval and marine forces of the Government. These totals for the Navy and Marine Corps only include those who entered the service up to June 30, 1918. The Navy Department is at this time unable to furnish me with the number who enlisted in the Navy and Marine Corps between June 30, 1918, and the close of the fighting on November 11. We do know, however, that the enlistment for naval and marine service in Illinois was unusually heavy during the summer and fall of 1918. A reasonable estimate of those additional enlistments would be not less than 15,000 men.

So Illinois contributed 286,163 men to the land forces and 28,341 men to the naval forces of the United States up to June 30, 1918, or a total of 314,504; and if my estimate of enlistments in the naval and marine forces after June 30, 1918, is substantially correct, then Illinois contributed a total of 329,504 men to the fighting forces of our country during this war.

In addition to this, when the United States Shipping Board was in need of men and called for shipyard volunteers, Illinois enrolled 27,000 men for this service, which was 3,500 more than her quota, and Illinois was the first State to complete its quota for that service.

Illinois has long been one of the greatest agricultural States of the Union. In 1916 we ranked third of all the States in the Union in the value of our farm products, Texas being first and Iowa second. The farmers of our State, like the young men who went with the colors, patriotically responded to the needs of the time. The devastation of Europe and the frightful loss of food upon the high seas by the submarine warfare of the enemy made the question of food supply one of vital importance early in 1917, and in response to appeals for more food from our Allies the Government called upon the farmers of the country to increase their acreage and double their energy, in order to meet the needs of our Allies and of our own country.

The cry went out that food would win the war. And the result was that the farmers of Illinois, by their patriotic and untiring efforts, raised the State from third to first place in the value of her farm products in 1917. In that year the value of the farm crops for Illinois was $842,042,000; that of Texas was $788,983,000; that of Iowa, $783,488,000; that of Ohio was $546,058,000.

In 1918 the farmers of Illinois repeated and even improved their wonderful record of 1917. Not only did she retain first place among all the States of the Union in the value of her farm crops, but she increased the value of her farm crops from $842,042,000 in 1917 to $879,679,000 in 1918, an increase of $37,637,000, while Texas fell from $788,983,000 in 1917 to $695,651,000 in 1918, or a decrease of $93,332,000. There are in the State of Illinois some 35,000,000 acres of permanently productive farm lands. More than nine-tenths of this land is in improved farms. The total value with the improvements thereof in 1917 amounted to approximately $4,000,000,000.

When the Government, on account of the emergency, asked the farmers of the country to increase their wheat acreage, the Illinois farmers went over the top by increasing their winter-wheat acreage over 10 per cent, while the total average increase for the whole United States was only about 4 per cent, and 14 per cent of the total winter-wheat increase of the entire country in 1918 came from Illinois. Illinois has never been a spring-wheat-producing State. Our climate is not adapted to spring wheat, but the Government called upon the Illinois farmers to plant 100,000 acres in spring wheat in 1918. The farmers of our State not only did that, but they planted 200,000 acres of spring wheat, which made a splendid yield, in addition to the 10 per cent increase in her winter wheat. So that during the year 1918 the State of Illinois produced 45,000,000 bushels of wheat, the yield per acre being the largest of record, an average for the entire State of 25 bushels per acre. So when our country and the allied countries were in need of food and were calling for wheat, the farmers of Illinois in 1918 made a record in wheat production that stands unchallenged. They demonstrated that they could farm as well as fight, and no State in the Union contributed more loyally in food, and the estimate is that our record of 1918 will be surpassed by the record of 1919.

Illinois has always been one of the greatest coal mining as well as agricultural States of the Union, although she produces bituminous coal only. And among all the people of the country, none proved more patriotic and more responsive to the needs of the Nation in this great emergency than did the coal miners of Illinois. They refused to ask for exemption from military service under the selective-service law because of their occupation. There were large voluntary enlistments for military service from among the coal miners of Illinois, and those who were drafted and were not exempted on other grounds willingly answered to the call for men, although the country was under a fuel famine and it seemed as though in the stress of the emergency none could be spared from the coal mines. Notwithstanding the loss of men from the coal mines of our State, who went into the military and naval forces of the Nation and did their part in the fighting, the coal production in Illinois increased about 11,000,000 tons in the fiscal year 1918, as compared with the previous year.

In 1918 Illinois produced 90,000,000 tons of bituminous coal, as compared with about 79,000,000 tons in 1917. Curiously enough, the State of West Virginia produced practically the same tonnage of coal in 1917 as the State of Illinois and showed practically the same increase in 1918, while the State of Pennsylvania, which produced over 272,000,000 tons of both bituminous and anthracite coal in 1917, showed no substantial increase in 1918. This coal was produced from 967 coal mines in the State of Illinois, in which were employed in 1918 91,372 men, as compared with 80,893 men employed in the mines during the previous year.

No State in the Union responded more promptly or more liberally than Illinois in furnishing money to the Government with which to finance the war and in contributing money to the various agencies that were carrying on war work among our troops at home and abroad.

In the first Liberty loan there was subscribed by the people of the State of Illinois the sum of $205,047,150, out of a total of $3,032,729,000. She was exceeded only by the States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts.

In the second Liberty loan there was subscribed by the people of Illinois the sum of $271,731,750, out of a total of $4,017,532,300, and in that loan was exceeded only by New York, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts.

In the third Liberty loan there was subscribed by the people of Illinois the sum of $279,253,700, out of a total of $4,151,512,350. In the third loan the quota for Illinois was $197,138,000,050. So the people of Illinois subscribed for 141.6 per cent of their quota, and the bonds were purchased by 1,607,671 subscribers, or 25.7 per cent of the population of the State.

In the fourth Liberty loan the people of Illinois subscribed for $467,291,200 in bonds, out of a total of $6,948,926,100. The quota for the State in the fourth loan was only $401,677,000, so that the State subscribed for 116.5 per cent of its quota, and the bonds were purchased by 2,124,346 people, or 34 per cent of the entire population of the State. In the percentage of the people purchasing bonds in the fourth Liberty loan the State of Illinois was only exceeded by the State of California, District of Columbia, and Wyoming. And in the total amount of money subscribed in the fourth loan Illinois was only exceeded by the States of New York and Pennsylvania. The total subscriptions by the people of Illinois in the first four Liberty loans amounted in the aggregate, therefore, to $1,223,323,800.

In the fifth or Victory loan there was subscribed by the people of Illinois the sum of $366,584,200. Our quota for that loan was $304,416,650.

In this loan Illinois was only exceeded by the States of New York and Pennsylvania, and the amounts subscribed in the fifth loan added to the amounts subscribed by the people of Illinois in the other four loans makes a grand total of $1,589,908,000, which represents the amount loaned by the people of Illinois to the Government to assist it in the prosecution of this war.

The population of our State is estimated by the Treasury Department at 6,235,000. So that there was invested by the people of our State in Government bonds an amount equivalent to $255 for every person living in the State.

In the first campaign to raise money to carry on the Young Men's Christian Association work in the military camps in this country and wherever our troops were in service at the front there was contributed by the people of the State of Illinois $364,784.

In the second Young Men's Christian Association campaign there was contributed by the people of my State $4,566,403.

And in the united war work campaign, wherein funds were raised for the Young Men's Christian Association, the Knights of Columbus, the Jewish Relief Society, and other organizations that were carrying on war work, the people of Illinois contributed $13,853,339. So that in the national campaigns in which subscriptions were asked for funds to carry on war-relief work there was contributed by the people of Illinois the sum of $18,784,526.

In the two first campaigns for funds for the Young Men's Christian Association work Illinois subscribed for more money than the combined subscriptions of the States of Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Florida, Tennessee, Kentucky, Virginia, and West Virginia, and in the united war work campaign Illinois subscribed for more than the combined subscriptions of the States just mentioned, omitting Kentucky and Virginia.

In addition to these contributions, Illinois responded liberally to the Salvation Army and other relief societies that carried on war relief work, but for which national campaigns were not conducted; but I have been unable to ascertain the approximate amount thus contributed.

To the American Red Cross the people of Illinois subscribed to the first war fund in June, 1917, the sum of $5,638,074. Simply as a comparison, it may be stated that there was subscribed to the first war fund by the State of Indiana $1,997,163, by the State of Georgia $480,670, and by the State of Alabama $384,893.

To the second Red Cross war fund, in June, 1918, the State of Illinois subscribed the sum of $8,331,769.

The total amount subscribed by the people of Illinois to the war fund of the American Red Cross during this war was, therefore, $13,969,843.

During the period of our participation in the war, between April 1, 1917, and June 30, 1919, the people of Illinois paid to the United States Government for income and excess-profits taxes and other miscellaneous direct taxes the total sum of $726,031,176.55.

So, Mr. Speaker, the account of the people of my State as to contributions in money to the Government and the war-work agencies during the Great War was as follows:

For bonds	$1,589,908,000.00
For direct taxes	726,031,176.55
For united war work	18,784,526.00
For Red Cross	13,969,843.00
Total	2,348,693,545.55

This would amount to an average of about $377 for everyone living in the State.

Mr. Speaker, I have stated that the Illinois National Guard was drafted into the Federal service on August 5, 1917, and was mobilized at Camp Logan, Houston, Tex., as the Thirty-third Division, under Gen. George Bell, jr. The division went through a very thorough course of training between September 1, 1917, and May 1, 1918.

I had the pleasure late in November, 1917, of accompanying the governor of our State and others on a tour through the various camps, particularly Camp Grant, Camp Taylor, and Camp Logan, where Illinois troops were assembled. The governor and his party, with the governor of Texas and his party, reviewed the Thirty-third Division in the city of Houston, and I can say what I heard a number of others say on that occasion, that it would have been impossible to find a finer disciplined, finer trained, finer looking aggregation of fighting men than was the Thirty-third Division.

Most of the units of the division sailed during the month of May, 1918, and disembarked at Brest, France. Early in June the engineers of the division were sent to work on the defenses of Amiens, where a great German drive was expected. And on June 20 the Thirty-third Division, after being in France less than a month, moved into the Amiens sector, where it was trained under the British, held part of the front trenches, and participated in several operations.

On July 4 four companies of the One hundred and thirty-first and One hundred and thirty-second Infantry Regiments took an active part in the attack on Hamel. Hamel was one of the defenses of Amiens. It was not of much military importance in itself. But it was of great importance to the spirit of the two mighty contending forces that were opposing each other at that time, and it was of great importance in the defense of Amiens. Amiens was considered the danger spot in the British front, and a German drive was expected there. The British were sorely needing help. They were, in fact, fighting with their backs to the wall. They had up to that time never seen the new American Army in operation and had no proof of its efficiency. To them the Americans were an uncertainty, and the remarkable fighting of those four Infantry companies of the Thirty-third Division at Hamel was a revelation to the British Army and had a tremendous influence. The Americans charged to the shouts of "Lusitania."

This was the first time in history that American soldiers had fought beside Australians, and the first time that they had fought with the British in an action of any importance.

The fighting of the Illinois men at Hamel demonstrated to the British and Australians that help had come on whom they could depend under any conditions, however difficult they might be. On August 12, in token of his appreciation, King George of England visited the headquarters of the Thirty-third Division and personally presented to 4 officers and 15 men various British decorations, such as the military cross and the distinguished-conduct medal.

The German drive on Amiens was broken; the British began their offensive on August 5, and continued to advance every day until they reached Mons, where the fighting was ended by the armistice.

I will not attempt in the short time allowed me to follow in detail the fighting and the fortunes of the Thirty-third Division between the beginning of the British advance on August 8 and the signing of the armistice. But it is a record of efficient military operations, of dash and determination, of courage, sacrifice, and achievement that is unsurpassed and makes the heart of every son and daughter of Illinois swell with pride and admiration and gratitude.

Early in the drive the One hundred and thirty-first Infantry broke the German line at Chipilly Ridge and Gressaire Wood, for which they received expressions of the highest praise and admiration from Gens. Haig, Rawlinson, and MacLagan, of the British Army, and Gen. Monash, of the Australian Army, as shown by telegrams on file in the War Department.

On August 23 the division was transferred from the British front to the Toul sector in the American area. And on September 5 it was sent to Verdun, where it relieved the One hundred and twentieth French Division and part of the One hundred and fifty-seventh French Division.

The Thirty-third Division was the first American Army to hold the front-line trenches on the famous Verdun battle field.

The Meuse-Argonne battle began on September 26, and the Thirty-third Division formed the right of the Third Army Corps under Gen. Bullard. The Illinois troops were selected to attack Montfaucon and the Bois de Forges, the two most powerful enemy positions between the Meuse and the Argonne. The Germans thought these positions could not be captured. The attack was made by the Sixty-sixth Infantry Brigade of the Illinois men, consisting of the One hundred and thirty-first and One hundred and thirty-second Regiments and the One hundred and twenty-fourth Machine Gun Battalion. These formidable positions were covered with woods, and were literally honeycombed with machine-gun nests, but the men from Illinois turned the position, and had them captured in 3 hours and 33 minutes. [Applause.]

In that attack the Thirty-third was the only American division which reached its objective on scheduled time.

For 11 days following the Thirty-third Division formed the pivot of the American corps which attacked the German positions between the Meuse and the Argonne.

Early in October the Thirty-third Division was transferred to the Seventeenth French Army Corps, and participated in the difficult and intense fighting of the French corps east of the Meuse.

From October 8 to October 21 the men of the Thirty-third Division were astride the River Meuse and subjected to incessant fire night and day from the dominating heights; they were subjected to overwhelming deluges of artillery, machine-gun fire, gas, and aeroplane attacks. Yet for miles they held the front trenches on the right of the American attacks west of the Meuse and the left of the attacks of the Seventeenh French Army Corps east of the Meuse.

On October 22 the Thirty-third Division was relieved and sent to the St. Mihiel front, where they relieved the Seventy-ninth American Division. There immediately developed desperate and brilliant fighting along this front, and the men of the Thirty-third Division soon captured in succession the strongholds of Marcheville, Bois les Hautes Epines, Bois de Warville, and the Bois d'Harville. Marcheville and the Bois d'Harville were two of the strongest points in the Hindenburg line.

November 11, the last day of the fighting, found the men of the Thirty-third Division fighting bravely and advancing on Jonville when the fighting ceased, and it is said that if the armistice had not been signed and had not the fighting ceased on that day the Hindenburg line in that sector would have been completely broken and the last system of defense between the Thirty-third Division and Metz would have been gone.

The Thirty-third Division is the only division in the American Expeditionary Forces and the only one in American history that has fought with the British, the Australians, and the French, as well as with the American Army. It served with the Fourth British Army, the Second French Army, and with the First, Second, and Third American Armies. It served with 12 army corps, including British, French, Australian, and American corps.

The Thirty-third Division is the only American division the officers and men of which were decorated by the King of England in person for distinguished bravery. From June 22 until November 11, 1918, nearly five months, there were only 18 days when this division, as a whole or in part, was not actually holding part of the allied front lines.

The division marched through Lorraine, went into Germany as a part of the army of occupation, and wintered in Luxemburg, where the boys of Illinois enjoyed the kindly welcome of that unhappy land.

When the French took official possession of Metz and their dream of 50 years came true, the military procession was reviewed by President Poincaire, Marshals Joffre, Foch, Petain, Sir Douglas Haig, and others, and at the head of that procession was the battalion of battered brave men of the Thirty-third Division that had broken the German line on the Somme by its brilliant attack at Chipilly Ridge and Gressaire Wood.

Let me quote one brief statement from Frederic L. Huidekoper's records of the Thirty-third Division:

> In no division in the American Expeditionary Forces is the esprit de corps superior to that of the Thirty-third, nor is there any in which its discipline is excelled. From the time it left Texas until the armistice no enlisted man was tried by a general court-martial, and only two officers were so tried. Never once in all the desperate fighting in which it was engaged did the Thirty-third Division appeal for help or reinforcements. It is the boast of the men of the division that they have never been given an order in battle which they have not carried out, and they have never been assigned an objective which they have not taken on schedule time. Their claim is justified by the facts.
> Perfection is unattainable in war, but in the Thirty-third Division the machinery functioned and was at all times able to meet the situation, no matter how difficult. Throughout the operations there were very few occasions on which the men were not fed hot meals. The supply of artillery and small-arms ammunition never ran short, and rations were always furnished in abundance, even under the most difficult conditions.

[Applause.]

The Thirty-third Division captured and made prisoners of 68 German officers and 3,924 men. They captured 13 heavy artillery, 87 light artillery, 20 French mortars, 460 machine guns, and 430 rifles.

The division suffered in casualties 228 officers and 8,263 men.

Only 1 officer and 17 men in this division were captured by the enemy.

The One hundred and twenty-second and One hundred and twenty-fourth Machine Gun Battalions of the Thirty-third Division were the first to make use in this war of the machine-gun barrage to neutralize enemy machine-gun nests in the woods while the positions were being turned by the Infantry. This was successfully done at Bois de Forges on September 26, 1918.

The battle records show that the Thirty-third Division advanced altogether 22½ miles while engaged in battle fighting against heavy resistance. [Applause.]

Individuals of the Thirty-third Division have received 110 distinguished-service crosses, 8 congressional medals of honor out of the 31 that were given to living soldiers during this war, 47 French croix de guerre, 41 British military medals, 5 British distinguished-conduct medals, 5 British military crosses, 1 British distinguished-service order, and 1 Belgian Order of Leopold.

I can not attempt to review the record of the other men of Illinois who served in the Eighty-fourth and Blackhawk Divisions and other organizations. They all served the country well, and returned home with a record of which the people of our State are justly proud. I regret I can not state at this time what decorations they won, but I am informed that 178 Illinois men outside of the Thirty-third Division received the distinguished-service crosses.

About the 1st of May last, or practically one year after the Thirty-third Division began moving to France, the division was reviewed by Gen. Pershing, Secretary Baker, Gen. Bell, and other distinguished officers who had made splendid records during the fighting days, at Ettelbruck in the Duchy of Luxemburg, and thereafter embarked for home. It was met in New York by our governor and his staff and other distinguished Illinoisans, and thereafter proceeded home, where the different units of the division received the homage and hearty welcome of the people of our entire State.

I am especially proud of the fact that there were four companies from my own district who shared the glory and the admirable record of the Thirty-third Division. [Applause.]

The success, Mr. Speaker, of a nation at war does not depend merely on the men under arms. There must be among the people at home the right patriotic purpose and belief in the justice of the cause for which the country is at war. The victory is half won if the soldiers leave their homes under the inspiration that they are fighting for a just cause, and the knowledge that they are sustained in their efforts and sacrifices by the united sentiment of those who are left behind.

At the beginning of the Civil War there was an unfortunate division of sentiment among the people of Illinois. But our State and the Nation were fortunate in having a war governor who believed with his whole soul in the cause of the Union, and who, though kept at home in the performance of his duties as governor of the State, performed as valuable services for Lincoln and the Nation as did his generals on the field of battle. [Applause.] Gov. Richard Yates, by his eloquent appeals to the patriotism of the people of Illinois, by his untiring energy in behalf of the Union, and his invaluable services for the wounded soldiers, solidified the sentiment of the people for the cause of the Union, earned the gratitude of the Nation, and carved his name on the tablets of fame in the temple of the State as well as in the hearts of our people. [Applause.]

And in this World War Illinois has been equally fortunate in having a governor who was big enough and wise enough to rise to the great occasion.

As the war clouds gathered quickly about our Nation and it became apparent that we were going to be drawn into the struggle, Gov. Lowden saw in advance the magnitude of the task before us; and when the declaration of war came, he was the first of all the governors to go before the legislature of his State to address them and ask for their loyal support of the Federal Government in the Great War. Favored by nature with an earnestness of purpose and an eloquence of address, he went about all over the State of Illinois speaking to the people and insisting upon their loyalty and cooperation in the prosecution of the war.

He visited the Illinois troops at Camp Grant, Camp Dodge, Camp Taylor, Camp Logan, and wherever else they were encamped, and made eloquent and encouraging appeals to their pride and their patriotism. For some years he had been connected with the Illinois National Guard, having been elected lieutenant colonel of the First Regiment, and he knew and appreciated the duties and the sacrifices of a soldier. His own son went with the Thirty-third Division to France. Gov. Lowden accompanied our troops to the ports of embarkation, spoke to them there, and bade them farewell as they sailed from our shores to France; and he met them and welcomed them on their return home. His courage and his eloquence and his patriotic speeches to the people of our State were a source of encouragement to our soldiers abroad and an inspiration to our people at home, that helped solidify the people of Illinois in the united support which they gave to the Government at Washington in the prosecution of the war.

I hope you may indulge me just a moment in closing to add a few words more about Gov. Lowden. I feel justified in doing so, because he has by his public service made himself more than a man of Illinois. He has shown himself to be one of the strong men of the Nation, at a time when the Nation needed strong men. [Applause.]

He was born on a farm in Minnesota. He lived as a young man in Iowa, where for a few years he taught a country school. He worked his way through college in Illinois. He became one of the greatest lawyers of our State. He was Republican national committeeman for Illinois for eight years. He was elected to Congress from the thirteenth district of our State in 1906, and for three terms he served with distinction in this House, where he made friends of all who knew him, and from which he voluntarily retired.

Since 1900 he has devoted his time largely to farming, possessing one of the largest and best-developed farms in the State of Illinois, and a large plantation in the State of Arkansas. He has devoted much time to the study and development of agriculture along practical lines and given special attention to dairying and live-stock breeding.

In 1916 the people of Illinois called him to higher duties and he was elected governor of our State by a majority of over 150,000.

By his services as governor Mr. Lowden has proven himself to be not only a great executive but a wise and constructive statesman as well.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. I suspect that the gentleman would be for him as a Republican candidate for President, would he not?

Mr. DENISON. Yes, I would; but I am coming to that later. In his race for governor he told the people of Illinois that if elected he would give them a new administrative code under which the administration of our State government would be simplified and economized. At that time our State government was administered through bureaus, commissions, and independent agencies to the number of 125 scattered over all the State. As soon as he was elected, Gov. Lowden began work upon his new administrative code. It was formulated by him, presented to the legislature, and passed, and went into effect on July 1, 1917. It swept out of existence more than 125 boards and commissions and established in their place 9 departments with a director at the head of each department. As a result, the functions of the government of our State are now all discharged at the capitol. The governor is in daily contact with his administration in all its activities, and there has resulted from it unity, harmony, and economy of administration. The economy that has resulted to the people of our State as a result of the adoption of Gov. Lowden's administrative code has been such that notwithstanding the fact that the country was at war for 22 months and rates, salaries, and prices of everything had advanced so enormously as to entail extraordinary expenses upon the State government as well as upon individuals, nevertheless our State administration was enabled in December of last year to reduce the tax rate of our State from 90 cents to 75 cents on the hundred dollar taxable valuation of the property of the State.

Gov. Lowden has succeeded in establishing the budget system of financing for our State. Under our new administrative code there is a department of finance, with a director of finance at its head, and there is a superintendent of budget, who, under the director of finance, studies the finances of the State and prepares a budget to be submitted to the general assembly. The department of finance provides a uniform system of bookkeeping in all branches of the government that are under the governor's control. It prescribes forms for accounts and financial reports, supervises and examines the accounts and expenditures of the several departments, and approves or disapproves all vouchers, bills, and claims of the different departments, and requires all departments to prepare and submit estimates of the amount of money that will be required by them. Under the direction of the director of finance the estimates of each department of the government are investigated, so that the financial needs of the State for the next two years can be determined intelligently, and from these estimates a budget is prepared and submitted to the general assembly.

The success of our new administrative code has aroused such an interest in the subject that 30 States have been investigating and studying it, and the legislature of at least one State—Nebraska—as I am informed, has approved of and submitted a similar code to the people of that State. The time is coming, and I think will soon be here, when Congress must provide a budget system of financing for the National Government.

The State of Illinois has authorized the borrowing of $20,000,000 to develop a deep waterway from the Great Lakes to the Mississippi River and the Gulf of Mexico, and under Gov. Lowden's leadership we have authorized the issuance of $60,000,000 in bonds to build hard roads throughout our State.

By his wise, sympathetic, and tactful consideration of labor troubles and labor legislation, Gov. Lowden has won the hearts and the approval of the laboring people of our great State, and now has their support, regardless of creed or party affiliation.

His practical interest in and attention to the problems of agriculture and stock raising has won for him the friendship of the farming people of Illinois. And his ability and successful experience as a lawyer and man of business have given him the confidence of men of affairs wherever he is known.

Illinois has given the country but one President, unless we may be credited with Gen. Grant. When differences growing out of a great moral question brought on the greatest political crisis in our history, the Nation turned to Illinois and called Lincoln to lead us through.

After 60 years we are again come to troubled times. While we hope the Great War is over, we know it is not yet ended, for fighting is still in progress in more than 20 nations. As the fighting ceases and the embattled armies scatter to their ruined or neglected homes, as the tide of patriotism recedes from its flood in the hearts of men, leaving them free to contemplate the desolation and the difficulties of their changed surroundings, there will inevitably be a recoil, a natural rebellion in the minds of the people against things as they are. The danger is that the hideous head of revolution may appear. Autocratic crowns are not all that have crumbled and fallen. The old standards, the old order of things in the economic arrangements of the world, have changed. I am by no means an alarmist. But he who has not sensed the unrest that is about us and has not seen the industrial storm that is liable to reach over into this country from Europe is blind.

The Republic of France has nobly withstood the deluge of fire and the sword from without. And she is now struggling to stifle the specter of revolution that is stalking about among her own people. Who knows what the near future has in store for us? Who knows when the submerged but potent unrest that seems to exist all over the world, and which is present among us to some extent, may precipitate an industrial crisis that might gather up the dissatisfied and hostile elements to an extent sufficient to test the vitality of our Republic? I believe the immediate future is charged with dynamite, and the presidential election of 1920 will be second in importance only to that of 1860. If at that time the Nation should again turn to Illinois for a man to lead us through, he will be found in our great war governor, Frank O. Lowden. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. I will be very glad to yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. We have been very much interested in the recital of the public record of the gentleman's candidate for President. In order to complete the record, I should like to know how he stands on the question of the league of nations.

Mr. DENISON. Let me say in reply to the gentleman from Alabama that Gov. Lowden is not a candidate for President.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I said "the gentleman's candidate for President."

Mr. DENISON. He is my candidate for President. The gentleman is right about that; but he himself is not a candidate for President. He has a man's size job in giving the people of Illinois a good administration and making them a good governor; but if the voice of his countrymen in 1920 should call him to the highest office in the gift of the American people he will be available at that time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman has not answered my question.

Mr. DENISON. What was the gentleman's question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. We are so much interested in his mental attitude on these great public questions that we would like to know how he stands on the league of nations.

Mr. DENISON. Of course, the gentleman will appreciate the fact that I am not authorized to speak for Gov. Lowden. Perhaps Gov. Lowden would not approve of what I have already said about him here. He knows nothing about it, and perhaps would not approve of it. I do not know what his views are on the league of nations, and it would be an injustice to him if I should undertake to state his views on that question, as I am sure my friend from Alabama will readily appreciate; but I will say that you can depend on Gov. Lowden having the real American view of it. [Applause.]

Mr. YATES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes; I am glad to yield to my colleague.

Mr. YATES. The gentleman has stated that Gov. Lowden is his candidate for the Presidency. Is it not also true that Gov. Lowden is the candidate of the people of Illinois for President?

Mr. DENISON. That is true. Illinois will present Gov. Lowden's name at the proper time. [Applause.]

If I can sense the sentiment of the people at all, they are more determined to-day than ever before to turn away from any course that might lead toward militarism. So I do not think next year will be a propitious year for a military man as a candidate for President of our Republic. He must be a man who understands, appreciates, and will faithfully serve those who fought for us and won our cause, but must himself be from the civil ranks.

Nor will next year be a fitting time for an idealist or a dreamer of dreams and theories. The country will need a practical man of affairs who has the confidence of men of business and who, having come from and been among the plain, toiling people, has their confidence and their support.

Those who would best serve the Republic should endeavor to lead the thoughts and the purposes of our people back to the ideals and the standards of the fathers, back to the Constitution of the fathers, faithful allegiance to which is necessary to the perpetuity of the Republic.

It is all right, I presume, to break well-established precedents as a matter of personal distinction. But there is at least one precedent left that has become the unwritten law of our country and is indelibly written in the common sentiment of our people. And I do not think next year will be a propitious year either for one who would aspire to break this precedent and become President for the third time, or for one who, once discredited, would aspire to come back again.

Next year the country will need, as never before, a new man who will have the good will of all and the enmity of none.

If it should be found desirable to have for President one who has served with distinction as a legislator in this House, one who as governor of six and a half million people has proven himself a great executive and a constructive statesmen, if it should be desirable to elect one who gave his time and great ability to the cause of the Nation during the war just closed, and with whom patriotism and support of the Government were his paramount thought and purpose, one who has worked with workingmen and farmed with farmers and has the confidence and admiration of both, if the people should want a big man and a good man from the very heart of the Nation, Illinois can give all these in Gov. Frank O. Lowden.

Mr. Speaker, with this record of our soldiers and sailors in the service of the country; with this patriotic record of our farmers, our business men, and our laboring men who could not serve with the colors; and with this record of our governor, the people of Illinois feel a just pride and an enduring gratitude. [Applause.]

On patriotic occasions we have for years proudly sung that beautiful sentiment:

Not without thy wondrous story, Illinois, Illinois,
Can be writ the Nation's glory, Illinois, Illinois;
On the record of thy years
Ab'ram Lincoln's name appears,
Grant and Logan and our tears, Illinois, Illinois.

And now of the men of Illinois who served in this Great War we can say with equal pride:

Not without thy wondrous story, Illinois, Illinois,
Can be writ the Nation's glory, Illinois, Illinois.

[Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that at the expiration of the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. RICKETTS, the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. FESS, may have 5 minutes, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES] may have 10 minutes, in which to address the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HERSEY). The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that at the close of the address of the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. RICKETTS, the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. FESS, may have 5 minutes and the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. AYRES, 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I think everybody in the House would like to hear the speech on Mexico, something in which we are all interested, and we have a man here who knows it at first hand, who lives on the border and knows what he is talking about. I think we should have a quorum.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I hope the gentleman will not do that, because if he does we will have to adjourn.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the request.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I want to congratulate the Republican Party and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON], who has just taken his seat, that they have one Member who is bold enough to rise in this Chamber and announce his choice for President of the United States.

Mr. YATES. Two Members.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Yes; two Members. The gentleman is the first one to rise in this Chamber and announce his choice for the nomination for a Republican President. Yes; that is all it will amount to, for in 1920 we are going to give you the greatest thrashing you have had for 25 years.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDSPETH. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. I will announce my choice for President of the United States—Senator HARDING.

Mr. FOSTER. I second the suggestion.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Speaker, the question of Mexico and the conditions in Mexico have confronted the American people for the past eight years. I was much interested a few days ago, and somewhat amused, at the recital of political conditions in Mexico by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]. I am sorry that the gentleman is not here this evening. I phoned his office, for I desired that he be present and hear the remarks that I should make.

Evidently, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman must have spent all the days of his life in that benighted country south of the Rio Grande (?). From his pronunciation of Mexican names, I take it that he was born and reared in that sunny clime south of the Rio Grande (?). I notice that he pronounced the name of Gen. Blanket as "blanket," and Gen. Victoriano Huerta as "Hoo-erta." I take it, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], who gave such a thrilling recital of conditions in Mexico, must have eaten his tortillas, chili con carne, his juevos y blankios under the pulka tree in the sand dunes of Mexico. I take it, Mr. Speaker, that in his younger days he has gazed into the dark eyes of the beautiful senoritas of Mexico in love making; yes, that he has placed his manly right arm around her supple and sinuous form and at the old Mexican fandango has whirled her through the amazing mazes of the giddy-glide waltz to the heart-stirring and soul-inspiring strains of Sobre La Solas and La Paloma.

I take it, Mr. Speaker, that he has practiced at the bar in that storm-tossed country—I mean the mahogany bar—and with a glass of mescal in one hand and a peeled banana in the other has drunk a toast to his native country: "Here's to the only land I know—here's to the land of my Mexico."

I take it, Mr. Speaker, that from his accurate description of political and historical conditions down there he has in his younger days, with sandals upon his feet and a moletta upon his back, with the shepherd's staff in his hand, called forth the bleating flock to graze upon the thousand hills, shouting "Jilo, boregos," in the country to the south of the Rio Grande.

I take it, Mr. Speaker, that from his graphic description of conditions down there in the land of Montezuma that in former years he has played the rôle of the festive cowboy—the vaquero—that in the midnight hours he has ridden his plunging broncho at the head of the stampeded herd and, mid the beat of hoofs and the crash of horns, has sung the weird songs of the cowboy to quell them in their mad stampede.

Being reared in the West, far removed from the seat of our Government, I had an exalted idea of our military chieftains, but since coming here and hearing the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] state that when Gen. Peyton C. March came into his august presence it made him sick—disgusted him—my idols were shattered; nothing but pieces of clay, and, sir, I am quite sure that when that distinguished military chieftain, our Chief of Staff, learns of the impression he made upon this distinguished gentleman from New York he will immediately resign.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] speaks of babbling apes in the Secretary of State's office, and he can get no information from that office that he can rely upon. Now, sir, during my short sojourn here I have had occasion to visit the office of our Secretary of State several times. I met with nothing but the most courteous treatment on every occasion, and, sir, where the gentleman from New York speaks of babbling apes the Secretary of State and his attachés must have regarded him in the same manner as did a negro convict in Texas—told me by my friend William H. Burges, one of the best lawyers not only in Texas but in this Union—regard the district judge, who was about to sentence the negro to his sixth trip to the penitentiary. The judge, with all solemnity, said to the coal-black negro, "Orange Franks, stand up." The negro arose and fixed his eyes upon his honor. "Orange Franks, have you anything to say why sentence of the court should not be pronounced upon you?" The negro, without taking his eyes from the court, began to bray for five minutes. A Kentucky mule could not have equaled his effort. At the conclusion, without taking his eyes from the judge, who was red with fury, the negro remarked, "Jedge, I gave you dis kine ob language 'cause I thought you would better understand it, sah."

The gentleman from New York did not impress me, in his political recital of events of the past 10 years concerning Mexico, of being entirely sincere in his advocacy of protection of the lives of Americans, and when he criticized the Democratic administration and referred to officials in the Secretary of State's office as babbling apes and was loudly applauded on the Republican side it occurred to me that his speech was inspired solely for the purpose of making political thunder for the next presidential campaign for his party, the Republicans.

I noticed the gentleman from New York failed to tell you that a Republican, William Howard Taft, was President for nearly one month after Huerta declared himself President of Mexico over the dead body of Francisco Madero, and he failed to give his recognition to Huerta, who had secured his office by treachery and assassination. I noticed that he failed to state to you the same William Howard Taft, Republican President of the United States, permitted Americans to be shot down by Mexican bullets on the streets of El Paso, my home city, and bullets from Mexicans across the line fell like hail on the streets of Douglas, Ariz., killing many Americans, when this same William Howard Taft was President; and when this was reported to Mr. LAGUARDIA's Republican President, who remained President over a year after Madero started his revolution, and when he was asked to extend protection to Americans in Mexico and their families, who were being murdered, their women outraged, the reply of Mr. LAGUARDIA's President, this Republican President, William Howard Taft, was, to 250,000 Americans who had their property and everything at stake, "You get out of Mexico—that the American Government could not extend them protection."

The gentleman refers to the administration of President Grant and to a certain note sent by Secretary of State Evarts to the American Ambassador, Mr. Foster. Let me state again to the gentleman from New York that the record shows that during the administration of Grant there were 52 raids made by Mexican bandits into the United States territory, and on one instance the troops of Porfirio Diaz pursued revolutionists into the territory of Texas and shot them on American soil, and this note was the only action taken by the administration at that time, which was Republican. In contrast with this let me recite a little history of the past. On June 18, 1886, an American editor by the name of A. K. Cutting was in prison in Juarez, Mexico, charged with defaming a Mexican citizen by name of Medina. He was denied bail, and on July 20, 1886, he was brought before a judge of the first instance in Juarez and sentenced to one year in prison and to pay a fine of $600, and also was to respond in civil damages. The Secretary of State of the United States, one Thomas F. Bayard, on July 22, 1886, wired the United States ambassador, Mr. Jackson, at Mexico City, the following message:

> You are instructed to demand of the Mexican Government the instant release of A. K. Cutting, a citizen of the United States, now unlawfully in prison at Paso Del Norte.

On July 26 Mr. Jackson wired Secretary Bayard that his demand had been denied. Immediately the President of the United States ordered Gen. Stanley, commander at San Antonio, Tex., to proceed with his troops to El Paso. The President of the United States further ordered that unless the American citizen Cutting was placed on the international bridge at noon on the 18th day of August that his guns, planted conveniently on the hills north of Juarez, would fire upon the town and his troops would enter said town and Mexico be taught a wholesome lesson. The Mexican Government saw that this Government was not to be longer trifled with, and before noon on that day A. K. Cutting was placed under escort of Mexican soldiers and escorted to the international bridge and given his freedom. Let me say to the gentleman from New York that this was a Democratic President—the red-blooded and great American Grover Cleveland. He put the fear of God into the Aztecs south of the Rio Grande, and this is what should be done by our Government at the present time—and it does not necessarily mean war.

All this from the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], who has given you an accurate description of conditions that lie to the south of the Rio Grande. Against this superior knowledge of the gentleman from New York I have only to offer that I was born and reared amid the honeycombed rocks and cacti and sagebrush of western Texas. When I was a barefooted boy, Mr. Speaker, up there on the banks of a beautiful stream—the Medina, which gained its name from a beautiful Indian maiden—I used to sit on the banks of that stream, as I say, a barefooted, freckled-faced boy and watched the caravans go by—the prairie schooners—to the wilderness of western Texas. Up there on the banks of that stream, where nature sings her sweetest songs and the babbling brooks dance in the sunshine and laugh in the shadows, I used to see the old prairie schooners go by, and I did not dream, sir, at that time that under the canvas covers, moving like snails with shells on their backs to the wilderness of western Texas, the candy-haired and rosy-cheeked children beneath the canvas covers, were the forerunners of one of the greatest races of people that have been raised upon this earth. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I rode the ranges for many years as a cowboy. Against the superior knowledge (?) of the gentleman from New York of the conditions in Mexico, I have only to offer that with other peace officers I have run down Mexican bandits and cattle thieves. They used to make incursions into this country, into the country along the Rio Grande, and drive off our cattle. We organized—I was just a boy at that time—and we used to go back into Mexico and get our cattle. We were not very good in those days at reading brands, sir, but we were splendid on the addition table, and we generally brought back our number, and sometimes we exceeded the quota [laughter], but we brought them back.

At the mature age of 22 years I was elevated to the position of a statesman in the Texas Legislature. For 16 years I served as a State senator and representative, and passed on numerous Mexican questions that confronted the legislature. I drafted the bill to organize the Rangers Home Guard, to protect the border against Mexican cattle thieves—1,000 Texas rangers. The first time I set foot in the little town that is now my native home, El Paso, away back yonder, many, many years ago, it was a straggling village of a few Mexican adobe huts, nestling on the banks of the Rio Grande, where it was said—and this is borrowed from my good friend Judge W. M. Coldwell—

> The Rio Grande ripples when it has water in its bed,
> Where no champagne was ever drunken—
> All preferred mescal instead;
> Where no lie was ever spoken, being nothing one could trade;
> Where no marriage vows were ever broken,
> Because the same were never made.

But, Mr. Speaker, with the intervening years El Paso, the real gateway to this unfortunate but, I believe, one of the richest and almost wholly undeveloped countries, has sprung from a nondescript village of straggling adobe shacks to a thriving, bustling, and modern city in every respect and particular. It stands in its modern vesture without peer in the great Southwest, and its beckoning hand of vast opportunities and advantages is attracting to her ever-increasing populace those from every State and clime who come and remain to enjoy her prosperity.

In places where once stood gambling halls, with their incessant metallic clicking of chips, the monotonous droning of guitars strummed by weary fingers, the mirthless laugh of painted women under the yellow glare of smoke-dimmed kerosene lamps, modern bank and office buildings have been reared to majestic heights. Adobe structures with thatched coverings have been blotted out and El Paso with progressive strides has taken its rightful place among the modern cities of our great and glorious country. Smokestacks of factories now dot the sky line and the hum of machinery has supplanted the nerve-racking jangling of the guitars, and El Paso, solidly based on a firm foundation, is continually adding to her prosperity.

There is every reason and argument why El Paso should be a thriving metropolis. In addition to being the gateway to Mexico, it is also the commercial center for northern Mexico, Arizona, west Texas, and New Mexico. El Paso boasts of a school system that is second to none. This system embraces public, denominational, and private institutions. Besides being the pivot point of a great and rich mining section—and in this connection one of the largest smelters in the country is located there—El Paso is also the center of the great cattle industry and of an irrigated district. El Paso is served daily by 11 railroads. Among the most important industries are the paper mills, box factory, cement plant—one of the largest in the country—foundries, brick plants, lumberyards, and numerous other industries, which are thriving and prospering. Gentlemen, it is only necessary for anyone to pay a visit to El Paso to be convinced of the wonderful opportunities there. Regardless of size and population—and El Paso has a population of 100,000—El Paso is one of the best cities in this whole, wide country, and I say this because I have proof to back it up.

I must not forget the city's wonderful climate. I could cite you case after case I have known personally of men and women afflicted with that dread disease tuberculosis who have come there emaciated and to-day the bloom of health is in their ruddy cheeks. From the snow-swept countries of the north these citizens have come to the sunny and healthful climate of El Paso, which can not be equaled any place, and they have regained their health. Could a city bestow a greater bequest on mankind than this? I think not.

And I ask you gentlemen, Is it fair or right that a city of the importance and prosperity of El Paso should be blighted by irresponsible Mexican bandits or by warring factions in that land of the sweet "manana"? But of greater import than this, Should our free-born American citizens be subjected to continued humiliation at the hands of these same self-styled and self-confessed despisers of Americans? I am confident that you are going to say that this should not be tolerated any longer.

Let me briefly review the revolutions in Mexico, and I say to you that it does not take much to start a revolution in Mexico. One Mexican steals a cigarette from another and it starts a revolution. Revolutions have come and revolutions will go.

Francisco I. Madero in 1911 rebelled against the government of Porfirio Diaz. Madero was a stockman who lived across the Rio Grande from Eagle Pass. I knew him personally. He traded and trafficked with the cowmen on this side of the river, and every one of those old pioneers will tell you that Francisco Madero was an honest man. He made good his contracts and his word was his bond. Madero was a dreamer, however. He was not practical. He was a spiritualist. He believed in communing with the spirits—not the kind that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] has banished forever from this country with his mild bill recently passed, but those unseen beings they tell us about; and when the spirit told Madero to make a move he moved. Madero dreamed of a democracy in Mexico. He had been educated partly in the United States. He dreamed of a government in Mexico like the great Government of the United States, but his people were not ready for that kind of a government. The first battle that he fought was at Casas Grandes, south of El Paso about 100 miles. He was defeated, and he then invested Juarez in conjunction with Pascual Orosco and Pancho Villa.

The gentleman from New York appears to think that we made a mistake in not recognizing as the head of the Mexican Government this bandit for 18 years, this outlaw from the Diaz government, Francisco Villa. After three days' fighting they took the city of Juarez, and then shortly afterwards Diaz, who had reigned in Mexico for 36 years, abdicated and went to Spain. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], in his statement here in the House, in his Epistle to the Ephesians, a few days ago, made the remarkable statement that Francisco de la Barra was in the Huerta cabinet, which President Wilson refused to recognize; yet the latter had to sit with him at the peace table. Let me say this with respect to Francisco de la Barra, regarded as a straightforward, honorable man, when Madero captured Juarez and Diaz abdicated all factions came together and centered on Francisco de la Barra as a provisional President of Mexico during the interim in which an election was held. An election was held under the constitution and laws of Mexico, and Francisco Madero was chosen as the constitutional President of Mexico at that election. He took the reins of government there in the spring of 1912.

De la Barra went to Spain. He is now in Spain. He had nothing to do with Huerta or his government. He did not recognize the man who ascended to the Presidency of Mexico by the assassination of his chief. [Applause.] Huerta, that is the man the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] states Wilson should have recognized. At the time that Madero took the reins of government Huerta had been a Diaz general. Huerta was a military man. Madero, out of the kindness of his heart, unsophisticated, never having been engaged in politics, called all the factions together and said, "I am your President, and I want to harmonize all factions." He called Victoriano Huerta into his presence and, after Huerta had crossed his heart and placed the Judas kiss upon Madero, pledging allegiance forever to Francisco Madero, he made him commander in chief of the Federal army. Soon after Madero had taken the reins, the red flaggers revolted against him, commanded by Pascual Orosco and Inez Salazar, and they commenced operating in the northern part of Mexico, in the States of Sonora and Chihuahua. Then Victoriano Huerta and Francisco Villa drove them from the country. As I have stated heretofore, Huerta was a military man. He had been educated in the military schools of Mexico and Spain. He drove the red flaggers back in the northern part of Mexico. At that time friction commenced between Huerta and Villa. Huerta sent Villa in irons to the City of Mexico and placed him in prison. At that time Villa could not write his name, and he scrawled upon the whitewashed walls of the prison "Francisco Villa," and to-day he can only make that scrawl. That is Villa. Now, let us take up that delectable gentleman, Mr. Felix Diaz, whom the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] paraded before you as the man to quell the troubles of Mexico. He said that Diaz has an army of 40,000 men. I want to say to you that Felix Diaz never had under him at any one time over 400 men. Felix Diaz is a moral pervert and a political degenerate. He is the man the gentleman from New York would have made ruler of Mexico, who, after acknowledging allegiance to Madero, and was pledged to him by all that was holy, started a revolution at Vera Cruz. As I now recall, Madero sent a portion of his army over there, subdued Felix Diaz, and had him brought to the City of Mexico, where he embraced Madero and placed the same Judas kiss upon Madero's brow and in every way renewed his allegiance. This man Felix Diaz, whom Porfirio Diaz, his uncle, gave very little recognition in his lifetime, a man with a yellow streak as large as that flag, a man who never in his life kept faith with any man or party, this man, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] states, should be recognized by this Government, and this Government should establish him in Mexico as its ruler. That is not all, gentlemen. He was placed in command of several divisions; that is, after Huerta came back from the north, after he had subdued the red flaggers, Felix Diaz for the second time revolted against his chief, his President, the man he had sworn allegiance to stand by all the days of his life, and on the 2d day of February, 1913, he again started a revolution in the City of Mexico against Madero. He captured the arsenal, turned the guns upon the Mexican palace, and blood ran like rivers through the streets of that beautiful city south of the Rio Grande.

Madero put Huerta in charge of his army against Felix Diaz, and for days they fought. Madero believed Victoriano Huerta was true to him until one night after a battle that had been going on for about five days, Huerta summoned his bodyguard and appeared at the palace where Francisco Madero and Pino Suarez, the Vice President were, had the instrument all prepared, and demanded that Madero sign it, acknowledging Huerta as President of Mexico, and abdicating the Presidency. Madero was a brave man, gentlemen. Whatever you may say about his misguided actions, he was a brave man. He saw the trap that had been sprung for him, and he sprang upon his assailants and fought like a tiger, and secured a pistol from one of the guards, but was struck down from behind by one of Victoriano Huerta's bodyguard, with the butt of a Mauser rifle, and placed in a dungeon in company with Suarez, and that night he and Saurez were foully murdered, and their bodies were taken through the streets and thrown to the dogs in some secluded spot in the outskirts of the City of Mexico, and Huerta had it given out that he had put them in the penitentiary in order to keep the populace down. That is the history of this man whom the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] would have the great President of the United States recognize. Is that all? No, no. That is not all. Let me tell you something more. A Mexican deputy, as they call them—a member of the Mexican Congress—after it was found that Huerta had proclaimed himself President—never was elected President, you understand, but forced the Mexican Congress to sign some kind of a resolution declaring him the Provisional President of Mexico—this Mexican deputy arose in his seat and denounced Huerta as a traitor and a scoundrel and a tyrant, not only once, but he denounced him during the entire day. That night this member of Congress was summoned from his rooms by Huerta's bodyguard and taken into the presence of Huerta at the palace, and then, when he was confronted by Huerta, he denounced him again as a tyrant, and Huerta had him seized and had his tongue cut out of his head, and he, taking the blood which flowed from his mouth in his hand, threw it in the face of Huerta. That is the man the gentleman from New York would have the great President of the United States recognize as President of Mexico. These are facts, gentlemen. That is not all. This Mexican deputy was thrown into prison, and there languished for three days, without food and drink, and finally Huerta put him out of his misery or had his guards do it.

That is the man Huerta, a man that succeeded to the Presidency of Mexico by deception, that gained it by assassination, and whose hands were reeking with the blood of Francisco Madero when he asked the President of the United States to recognize him.

That is not all. Another Mexican deputy had the temerity to rise and denounce him, and he disappeared that night and has never been heard of from that good day. And yet, gentlemen, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] says we recognized the wrong man and that then was where our troubles began. A man who had been the chief adviser of Madero, who had been placed at the head of his army, foully had him murdered in the hours of night and then said to the populace next day that he had him over in the penitentiary for safe-keeping.

Now, the gentleman from New York in his recitation stated that we should have recognized, or words to that effect, Francisco Villa instead of Carranza. I want to say to you that I am not going to defend Mr. Carranza. I want to state to you from my knowledge of the gentleman—and I have a personal acquaintance with him, because he was in Juarez for a number of months before he went to Mexico City to take the Presidency, and, being a State official at that time, I did confer with him about matters that affected the two towns and Americans generally—Mr. Carranza is nothing but a big chunk of pomposity, egotism, and ignorance. I want to say that in behalf of Mr. Carranza that aptly describes the gentleman—pro-German and intensely anti-American.

But should we recognize Villa, a man who had been an outlaw for 18 years, an ignorant man, a bandit, and a man who descended upon the little American town of Columbus and tried to sack it in the nighttime? Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] states further in his recitation that it is very questionable as to whether or not Villa is charged with having attacked Columbus. There is no proof, he says, that Villa ever attacked that place. Is there not? Let us see whether or not there is evidence to that effect.

A man by the name of J. L. Watson, who formerly lived in the good old State of Alabama, was living in Casa Grandes when Villa started for his raid to Columbus and passed by Watson's little farm on the road. He seized Watson and murdered him in the presence of his wife. Their little baby was given, as the mother presumed, to one of the soldiers, but fortunately it fell into the hands of a good old Mexican woman and was returned to Mrs. Watson at Juarez. This good woman was taken along. It was a trip that consumed about a week, going north to attack Columbus. She was taken along and maltreated by this man Villa and his soldiers, and at the battle of Columbus she escaped to the American side and came to El Paso and stopped at the Hotel Paso del Norte until she was sent home to her friends. They say there is no evidence that Villa attacked Columbus, and yet this woman, who was formerly from Alabama, stated to numerous of our citizens at El Paso that Villa was along and commanded his troop and rode a mule when he attacked the town of Columbus. Is that evidence that Villa was at Columbus or not?

An old cowboy, a friend of mine, William Corbett, who worked for me on the Pecos River many years, was running a range wagon about 20 miles south of Columbus. Villa seized him and his boss and hung them to a cottonwood tree. Corbett had committed no offense whatever against anyone. Villa stated at that time that "he wanted to see the gringo kick," and he hung him to a cottonwood tree. Any evidence that that bandit attempted to sack and burn the little town of Columbus? Well, I know it as well as I know the gentleman from New York is a Member of this House and that he has recently had a hair cut. Then, gentlemen, you have got to disregard the testimony of this good woman, Mrs. Watson, who was maltreated in every kind of a way during the trip north, where they bound her to a mule in the daytime all through that week's journey. Do you believe it?

Yet to my surprise a friend of mine, a former Congressman, Mr. McLemore, writes an article to the effect that there is no evidence that Villa was ever in command of that troop at Columbus, when he was seen all along the road by ranchmen, when he was seen behind the hill at Columbus holding a pack train while the battle was in progress, and when Col. Hopkins finally secured the guns at the arsenal there and drove him south.

I have had a little experience with Mr. Villa, rather unpleasant at the time. When he was in charge of the city of Juarez he confiscated American property on the other side, not once, but many times. I knew him well. I had a telegram, sent by the Secretary of State of the United States, directed to Francisco Villa, that he return to a certain American his property. I went over, and it happened on the same day that he murdered in cold blood the British subject Benton. I did not know that he had murdered Benton or I would not have been there. [Laughter.] In two hours, possibly, after he had murdered Benton, the British subject, I saw that there was great excitement, and I presented to Villa a telegram from the Secretary of State of the United States, that he should restore to this citizen of the United States his property. He was in a great rage. He rose up when I presented him the telegram and threw it on the floor and stamped on it, and he said, "You say to your Government that I have no respect for it. You say to your President that I think he is an old woman. You say to your Government that I have no respect for it, and I will not grant any of its requests. Your soldiers are cowards; and they will not fight."

I shook my finger across the table at him, and I said, "There will come a time when you will respect my Government." [Applause.] "There will come a time when you will find out whether the so-called 'Gringo' Army, the American Army, will fight."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed 10 minutes longer. I think 20 minutes is a little too short a time.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I thought I had 30 minutes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman may have 10 minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, there will be no objection. I wish that the gentleman, who has certainly impressed the House with his knowledge of the situation, will, before he takes his seat, give us some suggestion as to what shall be done in the future.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I will give it; never fear, I will say to my friend from Ohio.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I said to Villa, "There will come a time when you will respect my Government, and you will find out whether or not the American Army will fight." Thank God, that time came on the 17th day of last June, when the American troops crossed the river at El Paso, when shots were falling into my city, fired either by Villa or Carranza, I know not which, and threw the shrapnel into Villa, and he ran like a cotton tail to the mountains of Chihuahua. He found out whether the American boys, dressed in khaki, would fight when they went across to stop the shooting into El Paso.

Now, Mr. LAGUARDIA says Carranza was governor of Chihuahua. Carranza was never governor of Chihuahua a day in his life. He was governor of Coahuila when Madero was assassinated. His son-in-law, Candido Aguilar, is minister of foreign affairs. You have read his contradictory statements in the press. I believe this celebrated cabinet officer is now in Spain or in France. He was a milk boy, living near Vera Cruz, when Carranza went down there after Madero was assassinated. He became Carranza's bodyguard and married Carranza's daughter—minister of foreign affairs and as ignorant as a wild mule. That is the kind of a minister Carranza has. This man Bonillas, ambassador to the United States, was an engineer in the State of Sonora before Carranza took him up and made him minister to the United States.

I was amazed by a statement made by Mr. Bonillas recently in the public press, to the effect that Mexicans had always been punished for crimes committed against Americans on the south of the Rio Grande. I want to say to him that he can not produce an instance in 10 years where a Mexican has been punished for taking the life of an American in Mexico or any punishment of any kind visited upon a Mexican by the Government of Mexico for outraging a good American woman. Bonillas knows there is not a word of truth in his statement, and that it is false from beginning to end.

Now, Mr. LAGUARDIA seems to make capital out of the fact that Huerta was thrown into prison. I do not think it is important to this House where Huerta died, but Mr. LAGUARDIA wants you to believe that he died in a dungeon in El Paso, thrown there by the American authorities. He was in jail only six days. Let me read you this telegram which I have received:

EL PASO, TEX., July 11, 1919.

Congressman C. B. HUDSPETH,
Care Congress Hall Hotel, Washington, D. C.:

Huerta committed to jail July 3, 1915. Released July 9, 1915. Bond, $15,000. His quarters in jail were the best, being a part of the woman's ward. I attended him personally, giving him the freedom of jail, allowing him everything money could buy. Visitors at all hours. He complimented me through El Paso papers. His home at 415 West Boulevard worth $20,000, where he died January 13, 1916. He occupied this home about five months. This home is in best residence district. You will recall after his release from county jail he was at Fort Bliss a short time, and was treated royally while there.

BUCK ELLIOTT,
Ex-County Jailer.

That shows you the kind of argument that a gentleman will make here, that our Government threw Huerta into a dungeon and kept him there until he died. When I corrected the gentleman from New York he again reiterated the statement in another part of his speech. He only remained in jail six days and spent the rest of his time in his palatial home on West Boulevard. If the gentleman from New York ever visits El Paso, I shall be glad to show him that marble tomb out there in Concordia Cemetery where his martyred hero lies.

Mr. UPSHAW. Tell us about the future of Mexico.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Yes. I am talking to you, my Republican friends, on this side now. You are a majority in both Houses. You have some resolutions here pending, one introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON], I believe. Instead of having your investigations you have been reading in the daily papers, and you have been reading every day of atrocities upon Americans in Mexico. What have you to investigate? You have a majority. Pass the Emerson resolution and protect American lives that are being sacrificed daily down there while you are investigating here. You have read the Emerson resolution, but I will read it to you:

The Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to use the military forces of the United States in Mexico in the protection of the lives and property of citizens of the United States that may be in Mexico.

The Secretary of War is further authorized and directed to keep the military forces of the United States in Mexico for the purpose of protecting the rights of the United States citizens in Mexico until some responsible form of government is established in Mexico that will protect the lives and property of United States citizens.

That is the resolution. Pass it and quit your investigating. It occurs to me you are trying to make political medicine for the next campaign and are not really trying to protect the lives of Americans in Mexico. If you pass the resolution introduced by Mr. EMERSON, I expect you will get some Democratic help. You can not get a man, in my judgment, who is strong enough to quiet that benighted country down there. You may say it means war. I say it does not mean war. They have not forgotten, gentlemen, when Zachary Taylor went almost to the City of Mexico with 6,000 troops and whipped Santa Anna at Buena Vista. They have not forgotten when Gen. Winfield Scott visited Mexico and whipped Santa Anna at Chapultepec. No; Santa Anna had 25,000 troops and Scott had only 5,000. They have not forgotten that the "Gringoes" can and will fight. They have not forgotten that Sam Houston and his 680 coonskin cap and flintlock frontiersmen vanquished Santa Anna with 1,800 of his picked troops at San Jacinto, where a nation was born in the short space of 18 minutes. They have not forgotten the time when old Sam Houston rode his white horse, leading those unconquerable frontiersmen against Santa Anna at San Jacinto singing that love song, "Come to the bower I have shaded for thee." When he put the fear of God into them with the Minié balls from the muzzle of the flintlocks and the craven cowards, when they saw death approaching, fell upon their knees in front of Houston and his gallant frontiersmen and pleaded, "Me no Alamo; me no Goliad," when their hands at that time were red with the blood of the dead heroes of both places. No! They have not forgotten the Alamo, where Crockett died, where Fannin died, where Bowie died, where Travis drew his line and said, "Every man who wants to die for the liberty of Texas come across this line," and every man crossed. No; they have not forgotten the Alamo, the citadel of American liberty, the cradle of Texas liberty, the grandest cradle, sir, that ever rocked American valor to a full maturity of immortal glory. [Applause.] No; they know Americans will fight. I say to you that the time has arrived, in my judgment, and I am not a jingo nor an agitator. But I was reared under that flag. I am a Texan, but I am an American first. [Applause.] I repeat, they have not forgotten that Texans and Americans will fight.

Recently a resolution was passed by the Senate of Texas, which was sent to me, in which it is stated:

The point has been reached when the Government of the United States orght either to give the State of Texas and its citizens the same degree of protection in their lives, their property, and their purposes as is enjoyed by the citizens of other States in the Union, or that if the Government of the United States is incapable of doing this it ought to accord to Texas that liberty of action with reference to the protection of its citizens that it enjoyed prior to the time it in good faith abandoned its status as an independent nation of the world and became a State of the Union.

That ought not to be necessary, my friends. That flag over the Speaker's chair is ample to protect the people of the State of Texas. [Applause.]

The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] very wisely (?) suggests that a committee be appointed by Congress to go down into Mexico, gather together the discordant factions, including bewhiskered Carranza, and have a round-table conference—harmonize all of these warring chieftains in the space of a few moments, and let them select one of their number to rule Mexico, then withdraw the conference and abide the result. This, in my judgment, Mr. Speaker, is certainly an Utopian idea and one that would be easy of execution. Let me state for the information of the gentleman from New York that a conference of this kind occurred at Aguas Calientes about two or three years ago, where they met, kissed the flag of Mexico, which contains an emblem of a serpent and a cactus, wrote their names upon it, embraced each other, and pledged eternal allegiance to that flag. In 24 hours they were fighting like Kilkenny cats and then in a short time were warring worse than they ever had been. You just as well try to pen up the hyena, the rattlesnake, and the coyote wolf and harmonize the three into one homogeneous whole. Nothing but the shrapnel from a few of the machine guns of the boys in khaki from this side will have a wholesome effect and a harmonizing effect upon these various bands of bandits from Carranza down—to the south of the Rio Grande.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HERSEY). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUDSPETH. May I have three minutes more, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Texas be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I say the time has arrived, in my judgment, when Americans in Mexico should be protected. I am not talking so much about their property. I would not put up a dollar against the life of an American boy. I am talking about the protection of their lives. You can reimburse a man for his property, but you can not bring back the life of old John W. Corrall, that citizen of Oklahoma who was foully murdered a few days ago in Mexico. You can not bring back to that good woman, his wife, who was foully and criminally assaulted by Mexicans in Carranza uniform, that which they took from her. I need not refer to it. You have seen it in the papers. Many Mexicans who have been killed on this side have had on the Carranza uniform. I say again I am not a jingo or an agitator, but I say to you that in my judgment the time has arrived when this Government should say to Carranza, "You have not measured up, you have not met your obligations to protect American lives, and therefore we withdraw our recognition"—as has been done in one instance in the past—"and we will put our troops into Mexico to protect American lives, until a stable Government is established over there." [Applause.] That is what I say to you to-day. Pass your Emerson resolution.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I want to say that I felt it my duty to lay these matters before you. I should have a little more time in which to do it. That flag there has protected American lives in the past. I have never seen any utterance from the Republicans, but the Democratic platform of 1912 said—

We pledge our party to protect the rights and lives of American citizenship at home and abroad.

What does the Republican platform say? That is what the Democratic platform said, and I hope that pledge will be redeemed. I want to say to you that when the armies of the world were passing in review in front of Pekin, China, a foreign lady there saw the flags pass, and she asked, "What is that flag?" They said, "That is the Italian flag, that is the British flag, that is the French flag." Then the Stars and Stripes came by, and those khaki-clad boys marching with determination upon their faces, with pride in their countenances, carrying by the old Stars and Stripes. She said, "What flag is that?" A foreigner standing by said, "That is the flag that protects the rich and the poor, the peasant in his hut, the millionaire in his castle. That is the flag that protects democracy throughout the world. That is the flag that protects the women and children where it floats from the combined attacks of the world." [Applause on both sides.]

Gentlemen of the House, let us stand for the traditions of the past, let us be worthy sons of worthy sires, and true to the heritage they have bequeathed us, and let us carry that flag to protect our citizens in benighted Mexico. It is due them. [Applause on both sides.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. RICKETTS] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I want to congratulate the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] on his most splendid address. I want to congratulate the people of that State on their selection of Gov. Lowden as their candidate for President in 1920. However, I fear that the dear people of that great State have overlooked the fact that the Republicans of Ohio will have a candidate in the person of Senator WARREN G. HARDING [applause], whose ability and patriotism and loyalty and statesmanship are known by the people throughout this Nation. He needs no certificate of character from me or from any of the members of the Ohio delegation.

Mr. Speaker, on the 19th day of June of this year, just one month from the day Congress was convened in special session, I addressed the membership of the House upon the subject of the high cost of living. My remarks at that time were more or less of an extemporaneous character, because I had not then the time to collate and compile the figures and facts necessary to a more complete discussion of this most vital subject. To my mind this is the most important question before the American people to-day and deserves the immediate attention of Congress.

I had hoped to bring this matter to the attention of the House prior to this time, but during this session much of my time has been employed in attending the sessions of the House and in discharging the duties devolving upon me in the various committees to which I have been assigned. We have had before us the task of passing the necessary appropriation bills in order that the departments of the Government might continue to function for another fiscal year. Now that these appropriation bills have all been passed and are out of the way, we must take up the important questions of the day in their order. I have no apology to make for what I shall have to say in regard to this subject. It is my purpose to bring to your attention what the facts, in my judgment, conclusively prove to be a gross and vicious violation of the law upon the part of the storage trust of this country and other trust monopolies.

We can not deceive ourselves longer. We must meet the proposition of the high cost of living in its true light and face to face if we are to continue to enjoy the confidence of the American people and mean to do our full duty toward them. I believe that a public office is a public trust, and it is my purpose and intention, so far as I am personally concerned, to discharge that trust to the full measure of my ability, fearlessly, and as my conscience may dictate, and I take it that every other Member of this House is inclined to do the same thing.

All Members of Congress agree that there is a primary cause for the high cost of living. Few Members undertake to designate that cause. Just why the membership of this House should be so reluctant to give expression to their convictions with reference to this matter is not exactly clear to me. It may be due to the fact that the Members of the House have not given the subject that serious consideration which it so justly deserves, and especially at this particular time in our national history, during the great period of reconstruction, when most of us are wrestling with governmental problems. [Applause.]

I am frank to say to you that I am, and have been for many years, deeply interested in labor and in the welfare of the common people, and to that end I have given this subject quite a great deal of serious thought.

Since having addressed the House on this subject I have endeavored to assemble facts which I think this House should know, and which, in my time, I shall try to give to the membership of the House.

As far back as 1890 the question of preventing trust monopoly was before the Congress and was the subject of heated and spirited debate. The Sherman antitrust law was passed by Congress and was approved by the President on the 2d day of July of that year. Senator Sherman, of Ohio, was the father of this bill, being the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, which reported the bill. The bill was designated as "S. 1," and passed the Senate in the first session of the Fifty-first Congress. Senator Sherman, in addressing the Senate, said:

Mr. President, I did not originally intend to make any extended argument on this trust bill, because I supposed that the public facts upon which it is founded and the general necessity of some legislation were so manifest that no debate was necessary to bring those facts to the attention of the Senate. The object of this bill, as shown by the title, is "to declare unlawful trusts and combinations in restraint of trade and production." It declares that certain contracts are against public policy, null, and void. It does not announce a new principle of law, but applies old and well-recognized principles of the common law to the complicated jurisdiction of our State and Federal Governments. Similar contracts in any State in the Union are now by common or statute law null and void. Each State can and does prevent and control combinations within the limit of the State. This we do not propose to interfere with. The power of the State courts has been repeatedly exercised to set aside such combinations as I shall hereafter show, but these courts are limited in their jurisdiction to the State, and, in our complex system of Government, are admitted to be unable to deal with the great evil that now threatens us.

The purpose of this bill is to enable the courts of the United States to apply the same remedies against combinations which injuriously affect the interests of the United States that have been applied in the several States to protect local interests.

At that time the claim was made by the Democrats, both in the House and Senate, that a protective tariff fostered and encouraged trust monopoly, and I may say that under the force of the logic then presented there was the semblance of some merit. However, time has proven this claim to be illogical, as I shall endeavor to show hereafter.

That the evil of monopoly then existed there can be no doubt, and it was the primary purpose of this law to stamp out trust monopoly and to promote and encourage fair competition. In other words, it was intended that the law of supply and demand should regulate prices and control the markets of this country. The penalties prescribed by this law were not sufficiently severe to deter those persons inclined to continue this pernicious and nefarious practice. It served only to curb for a time, and did not regulate. Many prosecutions were had for violation of this law, and where convictions resulted the penalties imposed did not have the desired effect.

Food prices have continued to increase day by day, month by month, and year by year since 1912. Before the war there was nation-wide complaint of the high cost of living, but the rise in this country before 1914 was small compared with what it has been since. Between 1913 and 1918 prices had increased 107 per cent, whereas between 1896 and 1913 they increased but 50 per cent.

The Democratic Party had the majority in both the House and the Senate in 1914, and in conformity to its pledge in its platform adopted at Baltimore in 1912 it passed what is known as the Clayton Act, supplementing existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies. This act was approved on October 15, 1914, and has been in existence ever since. The Clayton Act is very much more specific and is broader in scope than was the Sherman Act. Both of these acts were framed with the intent and purpose of achieving the same end, to wit, to stamp out trust monopoly and to encourage fair competition under the rule of supply and demand. But few prosecutions have been had under this subsequent act for violation thereof, although the penalties prescribed were intended to be much more severe.

It is certainly evident to each and every Member of the House that both of the dominant parties have for a number of years been wrestling with this momentous question. Each of the two dominant parties have incorporated a plank in both their State and National platforms for many years past pledging their respective parties to a policy and the enactment of such laws as would reduce the high cost of living. To date neither party has succeeded, and the storage trust and trust monopolies generally have been running "on high" during the whole of said time, without regard to the law or to the welfare of the people of the United States.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICKETTS. I will.

Mr. EMERSON. My colleague is quite a student, one of the best in this House, and I would like to know what ideas he has as to what this Congress should do to regulate these cold-storage plants.

Mr. RICKETTS. I think I shall be able to explain fully the position I take in this matter before I shall have concluded my remarks.

PACKERS HOLD VAST POWER.

That the Nation's food supply will soon be dominated by the "Big Five" Chicago meat packers—Swift & Co., Armour & Co., Morris & Co., Wilson & Co., and Cudahy & Co.—and other like organizations unless fundamental action is taken to prevent it is the conclusion of the Federal Trade Commission in a report to the President on its investigation of the meat industry made public recently. The report, which is part 1 of a series, treats of the "extent and growth of power of the five packers in meat and other industries."

A fair consideration of the course the five packers have followed and the position they have already reached must lead to the conclusion that they threaten the freedom of the market of the country's food industries and of the by-product industries linked therewith—

the report says, and adds—

The meat-packer control of other foods will not require long in developing.

URGE FULL PUBLICITY.

Declaring that "the history of the packers' growth is interwoven with illegal combinations, rebates, and with undisclosed control of corporations," the commission report also urged the importance of full publicity of corporate ownership for all industries. It also stated that:

As to devices for securing such control there does not exist adequate law. In its absence unfair competition may run its course to the goal of monopoly and accomplish the ruin of competitors without the secret ownership being suspected and, consequently, without complaint to the commission or investigation of facts. The competitor is in jeopardy so long as he has not the knowledge of true ownership, and the public is entitled to such knowledge.

Pointing out that the "big five" packers, jointly or separately, wield controlling interest in 574 companies, minority interests in 95 others, and undetermined interest in 93—a total of 762 companies—and that they produce or deal in some 775 commodities, largely food products, the report gives this picture of growing packer invasion into related and unrelated industries:

In addition to meat foods they produce or deal in such divers commodities as fresh tomatoes and banjo strings, leather and cottonseed oil, breakfast foods, curled hair, pepsin, and washing powders. Their branch houses are not only stations for the distribution of meat and poultry but take on the character of wholesale grocery stores, dealers in various kinds of products, and jobbers to special lines of trade.

The report states that the "Big Five" are interested in banks from which their competitor packing houses borrow money as well as in companies supplying machinery and supplies to themselves and their competitors. They are principal dealers on the provision exchanges, where future prices in standard cured animal products are determined, and they are also important factors in the leather industry, in oleomargarine and lard substitutes, in fertilizer, soap, glue, and so forth.

ARMOUR FAMILY AN EXAMPLE.

The report continues:

Individuals of the Armour family are owners of grain and elevator companies, and J. Ogden Armour is also a prominent factor in the American International Corporation, with its shipping and shipbuilding interests, its imports and export companies in various lines, its interest in a company organized to develop cattle raising, meat packing, and allied industries in Paraguay; its control of a large tea-importing company and a sugar machinery corporation, and its minority stock in the United Fruit Co.

Some of the Swift & Co.'s subsidiaries are growing tropical fruits in Hawaii; a subsidiary of Wilson & Co. has reached into the salmon fisheries in Alaska, and a Morris concern cans shrimp taken in the Gulf of Mexico. In England, France, Italy, Holland, and other European countries large meat distributing companies have been organized by the packers to sell the meats from their plants in the United States, Argentina, Uruguay, Paraguay, Brazil, and Australia.

COVER WIDE TERRITORY.

The "big five," the report shows, have control of or interest in public-utility corporations in Sioux City; Kansas City; South St. Paul; Portland, Oreg.; South San Francisco; South St. Joseph, Mo.; Hill City, Minn.; Fort Worth; and Chicago. Messrs. Armour, Swift, Morris, and Wilson are also directors of banks affiliated closely with those strong sources of credit in the United States. The commission also states that—

Being thus allied with the powerful interests at the sources of credit, the packers' power is great, not only for financing their own national and international operations but for affecting, for good or ill, the credit of cattle producers and of competitors or customers in any line.

The report goes into great detail regarding the operations of the "big five" in all phases of food production, as well as in the field of by-products and unrelated industries.

THE PACKERS TO CONTROL THE MARKETS OF THE WORLD.

The packing-house trust and the storage trust not only propose to control the markets of the United States, but the markets of the world, as well.

In the hearings had by the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House of Representatives, from December 19, 1918, to January 20, 1919, this fact is clearly disclosed. I have read those hearings, which are made up in three parts, and the disclosures made therein are appalling. The storage trust and kindred trusts offered testimony in these hearings in opposition to Government control of the meat-packing industries, as proposed in H. R. 13324. These trusts do not want Government control. They are strictly in favor of private ownership, without Government supervision. It strikes me that these trusts would prefer to control the Government and the people of this Nation rather than have the Government and the people of this Nation control them.

The Skinner Packing Co. has constructed a very large packing and storage plant at Omaha, Nebr., covering about 33 acres of land. This packing company put out the following advertisement:

Millions of dollars have been paid in dividends to people owning stock in packing companies.

If you act at once, this is your opportunity to secure an investment in the 8 per cent guaranteed preferred participating stock of the Skinner Packing Co., Omaha, United States of America.

At the present selling price of $100 per share this stock is fully participating in the entire profits of the company and is preferred as to the 8 per cent.

Four hundred and twenty thousand dollars of this stock subscribed for by conservative investors within one week.

Omaha's Daylight Snow-White Independent Packing Co.

This company proceeds to show the present worth of $1,000 had it been invested in any of the following companies:

5 years ago in Armour & Co	$32,000
6 years ago in Swift & Co	20,000
3 years ago in Morris & Co	23,000
6 years ago in Cudahy & Co	26,000
10 years ago in Jacob Dold & Co	41,000
5 years ago in Union Packing Co	21,000
2 years ago in Wilson & Co	7,000
4 years ago in Lafayette Packing Co	16,000
7 years ago in Western Packing & Produce Co	27,500
5 years ago in Erie Packing Co	5,000
5 years ago in Kentucky Packing Co	7,200
5 years ago in Fort Worth Packing Co	7,750
10 years ago in Armstrong Meat Co	16,000
4 years ago in Independent Packing Co	12,000
2 years ago in Atlantic Packing Co	1,900
3 years ago in Standard Packing Co	3,250
15 years ago in Pacific Packing Co	71,500
9 years ago in Green Bay Packing Co	18,000

In addition to the above, this company proceeds to show what dividends have been paid by the various packing companies, which are as follows:

	Per cent.
Cudahy Packing Co	49
Swift & Co	28
Armour & Co	100.5
Morris & Co	180
Union Packing Co	67
Atlantic Packing Co	85
Kentucky Packing Co	45
Standard Packing Co	105
Pacific States Packing Co	35
Green Bay Packing Co	25

Not only have these various companies made enormous profits, but this particular company, promoting the interests of all the packing industries, uses this language:

We could show many others who are making enormous profits were their figures obtainable.

These figures are taken from different current reports that have come to our notice, and to our best knowledge and belief are correct.

This company is organized on a high-grade basis—no promotion stock.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICKETTS. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. FOCHT. I was only yesterday advised by a Member of Congress representing the Chicago district, when discussing this question of the packers, that the five great packers of America controlled but 20 per cent of the distribution of these articles that the gentleman is enumerating. If that be true, would it be possible for them to this unlimited extent to control the markets and dominate the situation?

Mr. RICKETTS. Not if that is true, but I think I can convince the gentleman that it is not true.

Mr. FOCHT. Not to convince me, for I am in entire ignorance of the situation and am only seeking information.

Mr. RICKETTS. The intention of this advertisement is clear. It is the purpose of the big packing trusts and the storage trust to sell its preferred stock to as many of the citizens of the United States as possible, so as to more firmly intrench itself and lessen the opposition to trust monopoly.

Gentlemen of the House, you have no idea of the extent of the operations of these trust corporations. They handle not only the meats of the country but the food supplies as well. The largest handlers of food supplies in the world are the packers themselves. They handle somewhere near 8,000,000 tons of food supplies in the course of a year, and the magnitude of their business, as it has been growing, is simply appalling.

I would like to make a comparative statement to show you how their business has been growing and give you a little idea of what is happening in this country. I do not think that anyone who has not followed this industry can really have much conception of what the facts are.

In 1908 the combined working capital of the five large concerns was $166,000,000. In nine years that capital amounted to $400,000,000 invested in their business—$400,000,000—and nearly all of it in money that had been piled up from accumulated profits, besides paying their regular dividends.

The earnings of these five concerns in 1908 were $17,000,000. The earnings in 1917 were $80,000,000. The earnings in 1918 were something like $100,000,000, and I doubt not that the earnings in 1919 will be in the neighborhood of $150,000,000. By earnings, I mean not gross earnings but net earnings, and I make no reference to the reserve funds of these packing-trust combinations, for it is absolutely impossible for anyone to ascertain the amount of the reserve on hand without having had the information furnished by an expert who had access to the books.

The volume of business done by the five big packers in 1908 was approximately $637,000,000. The volume of business done in 1917 was approximately $2,024,000,000. Swift & Co. alone in the year 1917 did a business of over $875,000,000, and I would not be at all surprised if his returns showed $1,000,000,000 this year in business, including the segregated properties.

Of course, I give these figures to show the volume of business transacted, and both the estimate as to the volume of business and the estimate as to the net earnings of these trust concerns is determined by the reports made by them. I am not vouching for their absolute accuracy. I take it that they are meager rather than exaggerated.

Mr. AYERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICKETTS. Yes.

Mr. AYERS. That does not take into consideration the earnings of the subsidiary companies?

Mr. RICKETTS. No; it does not.

Mr. AYERS. It has nothing to do with the tanneries or the wholesale houses of boots and shoes, or anything of that sort?

Mr. RICKETTS. No, sir.

These figures are startling, and reveal to us that it is the purpose and intention of these five big packing concerns to freeze out all the smaller packing industries of this country and thus destroy competition. This trust combination is in the price-fixing business, in violation of law and in defiance of the Government of the United States and of Congress as well. These concerns propose to control the supply of meat and foods of this country and to regulate the selling price thereof to the consumers of the country.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICKETTS. Certainly; I yield to my colleague from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. It is true, is it not, that the price paid the live-stock dealers has decreased, while the price paid by the consumer is increasing?

Mr. RICKETTS. That is exactly correct.

Mr. FESS. That is causing a good deal of distress throughout the country among the live-stock producers from this agitation?

Mr. RICKETTS. The gentleman is quite correct in his deduction.

Mr. FESS. Is it not true as an economic principle that if you control the surplus that is exported you will absolutely control the price of the home product?

Mr. RICKETTS. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. And with the tremendous demand in Europe the packers can control the price, because they can command it all, and at the same time, with more meat than ever before, we will have to pay a higher price.

Mr. RICKETTS. A higher price than ever before.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 10 minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICKETTS. Certainly.

Mr. FOCHT. If that would apply, as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], then likewise would not the importation of corn from the Argentine Republic, even though in small quantities, fix the price in America as against the corn raised in Ohio?

Mr. RICKETTS. I think that is true. There is no question about that.

I appeal to you gentlemen that the fate of millions of our citizens depends upon the proper distribution of our food supplies at a fair and reasonable price. The citizens of the United States have been paying exorbitant prices for all the necessities of life, and these five big packing companies have been profiteering ever since 1908, and the American citizens have been paying the penalty. Thousands of laboring men throughout the Nation, who were loyal, patriotic, and true during the great world conflict, are groaning under the burden of the high cost of living. The citizens of the United States at this very moment are at the mercy of these profiteering demons, and it is up to this Congress to relieve this situation. [Applause.]

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICKETTS. Yes.

Mr. BOOHER. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the price of live meat animals to-day is decreasing?

Mr. RICKETTS. Yes; except hogs. Hogs are quoted at 22½ cents.

Mr. BOOHER. Twenty-three and a half cents, are they not, and going up?

Mr. RICKETTS. If the gentleman will pardon me, I happen to be a farmer in connection with my law practice. We have some hogs and cattle on hand, and we have been unable to get a greater price than 22½ cents for the hogs and 10 cents a pound for the cattle.

Mr. BOOHER. I say to the gentleman that hogs are selling to-day at the live-stock market in St. Joseph for 23½ cents a pound.

Mr. RICKETTS. That may be true; I do not know.

Mr. FESS. I have reference only to beef.

Mr. BOOHER. Oh, the gentleman asks about beef?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. BOOHER. I did not know that.

Mr. RICKETTS. Cold storage is the key to the food purveyor's domination. Take away cold storage and his ability to dominate prices would fall like a house of cards. So long as food was in danger of spoiling, if not sold speedily, the likelihood of deterioration was a natural check on prices. So far as perishable goods were concerned, profiteering was out of the question. I am convinced that cold storage is being used to maintain the prices at high levels. It is an open secret that the cold-storage repositories are crammed with beef, lamb, pork, and mutton.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. RICKETTS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am very much interested in what the gentleman has stated. It is the subject in which the public at large is very much interested also. I know the gentleman has given the matter great thought and research and I would ask him how he would determine the price. Is the gentleman in favor of the Congress of the United States fixing a minimum price for this food?

Mr. RICKETTS. No; that is not my idea.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How would it be fixed better than by the law of supply and demand.

Mr. RICKETTS. The trouble is that the law of supply and demand has been abrogated by the Packing Trust.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Would the gentleman advocate a minimum price to be fixed?

Mr. RICKETTS. I think I shall be able to tell the gentleman my position if he will indulge me for a little while longer.

Meats stored in the United States on June 1, 1919, show startling aggregate figures, compared with amounts in storage on June 1, 1918.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Can not the same thing be said of the United States Government? Has not the Government of the United States now on hand 700,000,000 pounds of meat in cold storage, that the people are asking for and which they will not let the people have?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And a lot of other food also.

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the Government releasing all the food it has in reserve to the American people, and in that way relieving the condition of the people with reference to the necessities of life.

The packers are making the erroneous claim that there is a reduction in meat production, and a reduction in food supplies. This claim is absolutely groundless.

I have obtained from the Bureau of Markets, of the Department of Agriculture, a statistical statement of the amount of frozen and cured meats in cold storage on June 1, 1919, which shows the following:

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICKETTS. I will.

Mr. EMERSON. Can the gentleman give the percentage of the increase over a year ago?

Mr. RICKETTS. I think I can when I get through here. Now I come to lard, and the poor people all over this country are almost starving now for lard, because they have not the money with which to purchase it. That is just a part; I will insert this in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. RICKETTS. I would like to have about 10 minutes more.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to suggest this——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 10 minutes. He has been interrupted quite a good deal, and this is very important and very interesting information that he is giving the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Ohio be extended 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESS. My colleague will not want any more than that?

Mr. RICKETTS. No; I will stop whether I am through or not.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to suggest this in reference to some of the corporations which the gentleman quoted some time ago. The gentleman spoke of one called the Skinner Co., and I was wondering if we might not grant a Federal charter to the whole combination under that name. [Laughter.]

Mr. RICKETTS. I concur with the suggestion of my colleague from Ohio.

In addition to the foregoing table showing the meat in cold storage on said date, the following tables will show other food supplies in cold storage which are being held by the Storage Trust for higher prices:

[1] Three boxes to the barrel.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the above tables are official and show beyond question that enormous quantities of food products and other commodities intended for domestic consumption and use are withheld from the people of this Nation by this trust combination. These articles are being withheld for higher prices. This trust combination has no concern as to the comfort and welfare of the American people. If this Government could force this illegal and unlawful combination to release these foods at once, the high cost of living would be reduced within 30 days and the people of the United States would be enabled to purchase within their means the necessities of life and hunger and starvation so prevalent throughout the land would be eliminated. However, the Sherman Act, as supplemented by the Clayton Act, does not authorize the Government to enforce this action, and consequently the people of the United States are without a remedy because of the fact that Congress heretofore has not enacted a law that would relieve the people under stress of this character.

These wicked and vicious trust combinations are not only producers but have successfully cornered the supply of the products of this Nation so as to regulate prices as well. Senator John Sherman more than 28 years ago, in addressing the Senate of the United States, used this language in relation to the control of trusts:

> Congress alone can deal with them, and, if we are unwilling or unable, there will soon be a trust for every production and a master to fix the prices for every necessity of life.

He saw then that trust monopoly was an evil that threatened the welfare of the people. Since then trusts have continued to thrive until this day. In order to give you further data with reference to this matter, I want to quote from the report of the Federal Trade Commission to the President:

> The Big Five deal in or manufacture 775 commodities; 762 other companies are controlled by them; 95 other companies have them for (as yet) minority stockholders; 93 other companies have them in (as yet) undetermined interests; 9 public utilities corporations are controlled by them, namely, in Sioux City, Kansas City, St. Paul, Portland, San Francisco, Fort Worth, Chicago, St. Joseph, Mo., and Hill City, Minn.
> During the year 1917 they produced 44 per cent of the country's output of sheep and lamb shoe stock; 17 per cent of the glove stock; 9 per cent of the harness leather; 21 per cent of belting; 22 per cent of sole leather 20 per cent of the mixed fertilizer supply; 10 per cent of acid-phosphate supply; 33 per cent of the cottonseed-oil supply; 50 per cent of lard compounds and substitutes; 80 per cent of the oleomargarine supply; and 75 per cent of the cottonseed-oil soap.
>
> In 1916 the Big Five slaughtered 82 per cent of all cattle, 86 per cent of all sheep, 76 per cent of all the calves, and 61 per cent of all the swine.
>
> In 1916 the stockyards controlled by the Big Five received 83 per cent of American cattle, 78 per cent sheep, 78 per cent calves, 74 per cent swine, 84 per cent horses and mules, and 77 per cent of all animals.
>
> The average monthly holdings of nonperishable meats of the Big Five were, as compared with the total supply, 95 per cent frozen beef, 64 per cent smoked ham and bacon, 69 per cent dry salt pork, and 70 per cent pickled pork.
>
> The Big Five handled in 1916 50 per cent of the poultry, eggs, and cheese.
> The Big Five in 1916 sold 90,000,000 pounds of butter, 75 000,000 pounds of cheese, 135,000,000 dozen eggs, and 100,000,000 pounds of poultry.
> The Big Five are gaining control of breakfast foods, chicken feed, stock feed, fruit, canned vegetables, coal, fence posts, builders' hardware, binding twine, lumber, cement, lime, plaster, brick, sand, gravel, roofing, soda-fountain supplies, and rice.
>
> The Big Five controls 54 per cent of South American meat importations and 90 per cent of all refrigerator cars.
>
> The Federal Trade Commission says the Big Five meat packers will soon exercise a powerful domination over the Nation's food supply and international control of meat products.
> A fair consideration of the course of the five packers—Armour, Morris, Wilson, Swift, and Cudahy—have followed and the position they have already reached must lead to the conclusion that they threaten the freedom of the world of the market of the country's food industries and of the by-product industries linked therewith.
>
> It is apparent that the Big Five can dictate their buying price from all producers.
>
> It is apparent that the Big Five can dictate their selling price to all consumers.
> Thus they catch the American people coming and going.

The American people are not only paying the highest prices ever known, but they are suffering for pure and wholesome foods.

This profiteering monster is not satisfied with the greatest profit ever paid but is in reality demanding tribute from the people of this Nation.

The wholesale merchant is being put out of business, competition is being crushed, and the retail merchant is being forced to make the price to his patrons to suit this trust monopoly.

The Government, through the Federal Trade Commission, one of its agencies, has thoroughly investigated the general high cost of living and has traced the cause therefor to the door of the packing-house trust.

The commission's report was released for publication on the 11th day of July, 1919, and immediately the packing-house trust began to flood the Members of Congress with letters from its officers and agents urging Congress to vote against Government control or Government license of its business, claiming, if you please, that such legislation would interfere with its private business.

Gentlemen of the House, no private business should become greater than the business of the Government. [Applause.]

I doubt not that the business of the Big Five in a very short time will be equal to that of the Government. It has grown so large already as to baffle Congress in its control, so far as present laws are concerned. It has its warehouses, its station houses, its repositories, its agents in each of the large cities of the United States and in many parts of the world. It has its refrigerator cars carrying its commodities to all parts of the United States. It has been able to freeze out practically all competition. The way for its future progress has been cleared. There is no obstruction anywhere therein. Its power is so great to-day, and has been for the past few years, as to enable it not only to exact the last dollar of the laboring man and the common people for its commodities, but Uncle Sam as well, in the last two years, has been required to pay it an enormous price for foods for his soldiers on the theory that there was a scarcity of food products, when in truth and in fact the warehouses of the country were filled to the roofs, with their sides bulging, with all kinds and classes of food supplies, not only sufficient in quantity for the soldiers but for the American people as well in great abundance.

Not only is this true, but the farmers of the country are paying more for the articles and implements used upon the farm than ever before. The prices for wire, nails, harness, fertilizer, binder twine, machinery, wagons, farm implements of all kinds, seed, and farm labor have more than doubled in the past five years. It is true that the farmer is receiving more for his grain and farm productions than he did five years ago, but there is no comparison in the price to him and the increase of cost to him in producing farm products.

His taxes are higher, and everything that he uses upon the farm costs him more money than ever before. He pays more for the groceries that he uses in his home than ever before. And he is entitled, in all fairness, to have a higher price for the products of the farm and should have a price commensurate with the cost of production. [Applause.]

The people of the United States are feeling the power and grasp of this combination and are demanding of Congress a remedy for this evil. Millions of people are knocking at the door of the Congress, demanding of us as their Representatives to grant them relief in a legislative way from the ravages of a heartless and soulless trust combination which is seeking to throttle and enslave them and their posterity.

The answer is with us. What shall we do in the premises? Is it the purpose of this Congress to remain silent and take no action to relieve this situation? These things foreshadow some of the problems in Federal legislation, and we must meet them as men and patriots. Turn where you will and there is evidence of a trust organization and monopolistic conspiracy. As Sir John Culpeper said in the Long Parliament:

> They are a nest of wasps, a swarm of vermin, that have overcrept the land. Like the frogs of Egypt they have gotten possession of our dwellings and we have scare a room free from them. They sup in our cups; they dip in our dish; they sit by our fire. We find them in the dye vat, washbowl, and powdering tub. They share with the butler in his box. They will not bate us a pin. We may not buy our clothes without their brokerage. These are the leeches that have sucked the Commonwealth so hard that it is almost hectical.

These conditions point to the plain duty of Congress. We can drive out of interstate and foreign commerce every corporation with fictitious and watered stock, those whose capital stock is so great as to make them approximate monopoly, all holding companies, and all corporations whose stocks are owned and controlled by holding companies and other corporations. We can place a limitation on the capital stock of these corporations and banks; we can prohibit their consolidating in the roundabout way now in vogue which piles up money in their vaults amounting to many millions of dollars daily, to the detriment of the entire country. We have the power under the Constitution to prevent this interlocking of directorates and coalescing of stocks and interests and should hasten to apply it by congressional action. We know the facts, and a comprehensive law will bring the relief so manifestly just to the people. [Applause.]

Gentlemen of the House, I say to you in all candor that this question will be a consuming and burning political issue during the years to follow and will not down till the appropriate legislative remedies have been devised and applied and the Government restored to the hands of the people, where their just rights will be protected and safeguarded.

For the past two and a half years we have heard a great deal about preserving the rights of Americans abroad, and the people of this Nation were a unit in that regard. I am one American who believes it the duty of this Government, through the Congress, to protect first American rights in America for Americans; and as a legislator and an American I dedicate my energies to the people of this Nation, and with the Constitution as my guide and the sanctity of the American home as my inspiration I am ready, willing, and anxious to do all within my power to secure such Federal legislation as will destroy forever this evil and restore to the American people their just and sacred rights. [Applause.]

TARIFF ON PEARL AND SHELL BUTTONS.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7705) to amend section 339 of the tariff act of October 3, 1913, in respect to the tariff on buttons of shell and pearl.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed under the rule.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman from Ohio proceeds, I would like to ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on this subject and also on the league of nations.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, addresses in the House are not always interesting and not always informative, but I think this afternoon is an exception. It has been an afternoon almost entirely given up to the discussion of public measures, and I think that every address that has been delivered is a distinct contribution to the information that the public ought to have, without a single exception. I was especially interested in the last speaker's investigations, and all I have to say about that is that if, under any form of permission or omission, any group of men will ever get control of the foodstuffs of the country it is a matter that the Government must take in hand. I would not be in favor of the Government undertaking to operate the packers' business, but I am in favor of the Government controlling it, and it seems to me that it is inevitable when men will say that a group of men to-day are more powerful than the Government is, and that has been said many times in the last few months. Whether there be any truth in it or not, the mere statement of it by such figures as the Trade Commission present and the comments given by my colleague this afternoon warrants this Government's taking some position of control.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. AYRES. What remedy would the gentleman suggest by way of Government control if not ownership?

Mr. FESS. I do not believe that the Government can successfully operate the business itself. Our railway experience should cure all of us on Government ownership. I should think under a system of licenses perhaps they can get at any guilt that is being perpetrated. I want to say to my friend from Kansas that while I have looked into the facts that seem to demonstrate that there is danger, I have not yet found a method of control that I am entirely satisfied with.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I was just going to inquire whether or not the gentleman approved of the Government of the United States holding up 700,000,000 pounds of meat and other canned goods, of which the people of the country are in need?

Mr. FESS. I think the War Department have taken steps to relieve that situation under the pressure of public opinion that was started here in the House some weeks ago, but what success they are making I am not now aware.

I ought to say this, that there is a committee of Congress at this moment investigating into the question of foodstuffs and control. There is also a movement on foot to reach exact facts in market control, not alone in investigating what is being done by others but what ought to be offered as a remedy on the part of the Government. That is in process now.

I was also interested, as every Member of this House must have been, in the remarks of the Member from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH] on the Mexican question, and I asked him a question in most perfect good faith as to what is to be the future of Mexico, and his statement that there is no person to-day south of our border in that unhappy country that is strong enough to maintain order there makes it a very serious question for our country at this moment. There is also a resolution now before the Rules Committee looking into the possibilities of some relief, if our Government can in a diplomatic way lend it, and that resolution may come before Congress.

I speak of the problems now before the country as viewed by a Congress commissioned by the people to find a rational solution. These problems are, some of them, new, all of them imminent and tremendously important. Rightful solution is the duty of the hour. Our first duty is to clearly comprehend what the war has brought us in the way of domestic problems, and then enact such legislation as is demanded by the exigencies of the times.

The financial problem is an outstanding question which must enlist the best brain of our Nation. Prior to the war the high-water mark of our governmental expenditures was $1,125,000,000. The average annual expenditure for 10 years prior to the war was about three-quarters of a billion dollars. Our public debt was less than one billion. To-day we have a public debt which places an annual interest charge upon the Treasury greater than the total expenditure on all demands of the Government prior to the war. There is small chance of this fixed charge being greatly lessened in years to come. Then the war-risk insurance claims will exact a heavy charge upon the Treasury. In this law we take care of the dependents of the soldiers who made the supreme sacrifice. There are about 75,000 of our sons who sleep in the "windowless palace of death." We also compensate for disabilities incurred. There were at least 200,000 sons disabled in various degrees. The provisions of this law will make a heavy charge.

MONEY FOR MILITARY.

The military necessity for maintaining an army will approach a billion. The bill that left the House carried over three-quarters of a billion. The Navy bill carried considerably over one-half a billion. The Railway Administration demands over one-half billion to satisfy the deficit which may reach nearer a billion. The Shipping Board will demand over one-half billion, and the wheat crop will require probably one billion more. There will be partial returns from the railways and sales of ships, and quite probably a larger return in the sale of wheat. However, the most conservative estimate of our annual expenditures will approach $4,000,000,000, and it may go to $6,000,000,000.

Our first great concern is to stop the leaks, shut off the extravagances induced by the war.

We were assured by Secretary Glass that the Victory loan of $4,500,000,000 was our last. I wish it might be, but relief from this riot of expenditure still going on must be found or we will have at least two more loans.

The loan campaign closed May 10. By May 1 the Government had anticipated and consumed all of the loan except $2,226,000,000. Beginning with January last, our average monthly expenditure up to June was over $1,400,000,000. At that rate all the Victory loan will be consumed by July 1. Every available source of revenue will not increase this fund beyond $5,000,000,000. If our monthly charge will be reduced to $1,000,000,000 by January 1 next, we will face a deficit of at least $2,000,000,000, with six months yet to run before the year ends. If you can tell me how we can meet the obligations without further borrowing, I would be glad to have you do so.

In the meantime our first duty is plain. Stop the extravagances, if it requires a meat ax to do it.

In this connection the country will be glad to know what the Republican Congress has done and is doing. By the 21st of June the House had sent to the Senate the eighth and last appropriation bill. These eight measures passed the House last session but failed in the Senate. It was fortunate that they failed, because this Republican Congress, charged with the duty of cutting off waste, saved in four of the eight bills the enormous sum of over $1,000,000,000, making a saving of about $40,000,000 a day for every day we have been in session.

The country will indorse the rational expedition in legislation of this Congress.

SENATE ACTS PROMPTLY.

For 10 years past, ever since the Democratic Party has had control of the House, the 30th of June, the end of the fiscal year, always found us with some of the appropriation bills incomplete, which necessitated a continuing resolution to carry over the appropriations of the preceding year, that the Government could continue in accordance with the law.

The Senate acted with expedition upon these measures. Our only concern was the embarrassment of securing the signature of the President before that time, which is required by law, in order to avoid a critical situation of an interregnum, when the Government machinery must either stop or run without legal authority. Congress did its part, and if the President could not be located no fault can lie with the Sixty-sixth Congress.

Last March the Democratic Congress ended with more than half of the supply bills not yet enacted into law. The railway bill was an emergency bill. Likewise the third urgent deficiency bill, carrying provision for the allowances for 700,000 families of soldiers, failed of passage. Before the month was ended the Treasury cabled the President of the situation, but it appears he did not care to have Congress in session and did not yield to the imperative demands of the unfortunate situation until a second cable was sent from the Treasury Department. Congress was called to meet May 19, just six weeks before the end of the fiscal year. Yet to-day we see the greatest record ever achieved in the history of Congress—a new Congress convened, organized, with a constructive policy announced, every appropriation bill passed over to the Senate, in addition to numerous other emergency measures, such as special committees of investigation created and at work, and a clean saving over the bills passed by the Democratic House of $40,000,000 per day for every day since the session opened. I challenge the RECORD to show another such achievement in the history of Congress.

In this effort to reduce the needless waste committees of investigation are now at work. The real purpose is not so much to expose the rank inefficiency of this administration—the whole country knows that already—nor to simply prosecute those whose official conduct may demand it, but primarily to lay the foundation to cut out the super-machinery war agencies created under the stress of war, costing the country millions of dollars and which are now turning heaven and earth to compel continuance. Every day we are assured by delegations and representatives of these agencies if we do not come forth with the needed appropriations we have failed to grasp the vision of the new world, lost our opportunity to serve our times, and forfeited the favorable judgment of all forward-looking people. Washington to-day is a nesting place of various agencies demanding that war activities, many of them supported from the President's emergency fund, be continued in peace time. Our duty is to sift out this sort of needless extravagance, and we are doing it.

WAR CAMPS BLOCKED.

Mr. Speaker, the House after three hours' debate forbade the further purchase of lands or new construction in war camps and cantonments. It was discovered that a tremendous tract of land of something like 120,000 acres down in Georgia was purchased since the armistice was signed to remove the Fort Sill activities to Fort Benning, Ga. Although the House Military Committee refused to recommend it, the purchase was made in spite of that action. Congress must take immediate steps on such deals to punish the culpable parties without regard to individual cases, no matter how high in rank the persons involved. This investigation is now taking place.

While we are using the knife to detach needless waste, we must not close our eyes to necessary expenditures. We must find the needed funds for that purpose. Our great concern must be how we can lay the burden equitably and safely. We must not dry up the sources of revenue by laying destructive taxes and thus destroy enterprise. "We must not kill the goose that lays the golden egg." This problem must enlist the best brain of our country, which to-day demands clear thinking and courageous action of an intelligent citizenry rather than the rantings of a demagogue.

Closely connected with this financial question are industrial problems such as the railway and merchant marine policies of the Nation. Both of these problems are now being worked out by the Interstate and Foreign Commerce and the Merchant Marine Committees, which are now having daily hearings.

Mr. Speaker, whatever may be the predilection of the country upon the railway policy the present impossible situation can not continue. We see the anomalous condition of the second largest industry in the world, which up to 1914 was one of the most prosperous, doing the greatest business, at the least cost and greatest efficiency in service of any railway system in the world, to-day facing bankruptcy. In 1913 the fatal Underwood bill was passed, and within one year bankruptcy was facing many roads, which were thrown into receiverships to avoid it. Then came the war, which demanded the maximum utilization and efficiency of the transportation capacity of the Nation. Under our laws of limitation the business could not be run as a single system. The Government took over the railways in order to avoid the limitations imposed by law. We have now been under Government operation long enough to demonstrate the frightful results of attempting to operate the mammoth business by a political body instead of a business body. We see the highest rates and consequent heaviest burdens upon the public, the shipper, and traveler ever paid in the history of the business, the greatest gross income realized, the most inefficient service ever suffered, the least insurance against losses ever known, and the greatest deficit ever experienced by the business. Our Treasury is called upon to meet a deficit that will likely reach above the billion mark. Bankruptcy at the moment of stupendous business can only be avoided by resorting to the National Treasury. This orgy of expenditure must be rectified.

POSITION OF THE PUBLIC.

In the solution there are at least three parties who must be kept in mind. Logically they are the owners, whose investments made possible the transportation facilities; labor, whose skill guarantees the highest degree of efficiency the public has a right to demand; and the public, who pay the bills.

While any solution must see that the owners, investors, and managers must have reasonable profit, the time is long gone by when the business can be run for profit alone. While labor has a right to demand steady employment under the best possible conditions at a scale of wage which will insure an American standard of living, the time has not come and will not come when the roads can be run for wages alone. Both of these elements must be considered, but must not exclude the interest of the public at large. As Members of Congress we are bound to represent all the people who make possible the transportation business, including with the employer and the employee the public, which is the largest factor in the solution.

It would appear that the wisest solution is to so amend the laws as to enable us to return at the earliest possible moment the roads to the owners under such governmental regulation as will insure against abuses of the public. The country will be glad to know that we are now entering upon legislation to accomplish that end and will finish it before the end of the year.

The stress of war demanded American ships. The Government set out to build them. We have now completed and in the process of building 13,000,000 tonnage. This will make us second only to England in a merchant marine. Since these ships were built in time of war at war prices of raw material and labor, they cost perhaps fully twice what our competitive ships on the Atlantic cost and easily four times what Japanese ships cost. Their operation will cost very much more because of our higher standard of wages.

The first duty is to define our policy. Congress has already directed the formulation of a policy. Will we go on the sea to stay or shall we abandon it to our competitors? I confidently declare that we shall go on the sea to remain there. We will not allow again our competitors to carry our overseas goods. The big question is how can we operate these ships in competition with European and Asiatic competitors? Shall we reduce our labor to their standard? I am sure we will not, as we should not. We have a choice of three methods.

We can operate them by the Government, we can lease them to American companies to be operated under the American flag as American bottoms, or we can sell them outright to American companies. In either case it will be necessary for the Government to make up the difference in cost of operation.

FOR REASONS WELL KNOWN.

I am opposed to governmental operation for reasons too well known to need comment. Governmental operation is at once wickedly extravagant, hopelessly inefficient, and totally irresponsible. As in the case of the railways the only limit will be the depth of the National Treasury. I am opposed to the Government doing what private enterprise can do better. We have directed an investigation of the extravagances of the Shipping Board and Emergency Fleet Corporation, which have already expended the enormous sum of three and one-fourth billion dollars, a sum three times the total expenditure of the Government any one year prior to the war. There must be an accounting of this vast expenditure.

The second method is that of leasing. If we lease the ships under contract to maintain American standards, then the Government will be called upon to make up the difference in cost of operation, which will be a subsidy to labor.

If we sell them, the same thing will be required. From my viewpoint I would prefer the latter method, call it what you may.

The question of unemployment may become acute, and is attracting the attention of the present Congress. While there is no evidence of it at present, we must keep our eyes open to the possibility to avoid it. In passing from a war to a peace basis our important duty is to see that labor is employed. The first thing demanded is that the Government must unshackle business and give enterprise a chance. It should invite capital to invest in the enlargement of existing plants and in the erection of new businesses.

We should adopt such a policy as will allow every idle dollar to invest profitably so that every man and woman wishing employment can find it at reasonable wages. This is the surest protection against unemployment, and is now engaging the attention of the Ways and Means Committee.

In case it became necessary we could enter upon a system of National and State road building, as such an enterprise would result in permanent good and without undue interference with private enterprise. I would be willing, if necessary, to enter upon the project of reclaiming waste lands, of irrigating arid regions, which would add to the acreage of the country. However, all this must be sharply guarded against unsound policies which lead to the destruction of initiative, the greatest incentive to progress.

It is to be hoped that we will never see an industrial situation in our country where there will be three or four persons for every job, especially in times of high cost of living, such as we now experience. Unemployment means great suffering. The high level of prices was induced by the war when the Government embarked upon a campaign of lending by borrowing. The country in a riot of borrowing for war purposes paid all sorts of prices for war material and labor, which lifted the price level abnormally as expressed in the price of all articles, whether of war or peace. The Treasury to keep pace with the price current expanded currency under the Federal reserve act, until to-day instead of $16 per capita circulation, as immediately after the Civil War, it is now $57, of which over half is Federal reserve notes, largely based upon commercial paper. That means that the dollar to-day has lost at least one-half of its purchasing power. The abnormally high wages do not operate favorably to labor.

It must be seen that labor can not be reduced until the cost of living is reduced. This can not be done until we call a halt to the enormous waste, and the unpardonable extravagance of the Government in its dealings. It will also require a gradual deflation of the currency.

The immediate problem is to keep industries going, money invested, that labor may be employed. The cost of an article of industry must not prevent its marketing, for in that case there will be neither work nor wages, and suffering must result. The investigation now in progress to fix the cause of the high cost and to recommend to Congress measures of relief should result in some definite action. Out of such suffering spring dangerous dogmas. Upon starvation anarchy feeds. It breeds that dangerous brand of modern political and industrial stagnation, Bolshevism.

MENACING SYMPTOMS.

The numerous outbreaks in our great centers are the most menacing symptoms facing us as a result of the war. When in our own beloved Republic the largest auditorium in the metropolis of the Middle West can be filled to capacity by a crowd which cheers to the echo every assault upon our system of government and even hisses the appearance of the picture of our marching sons in uniform, a scene which can be duplicated in other centers, our people must become aroused at the real meaning of such conduct. The Immigration Committee is now at work on this serious question.

I speak for myself alone when I say now and here that I will vote to forcibly deport from our shores every man and woman of responsible age who hisses the sight of an American soldier or who attacks the American flag. Instead of official flirting with these elements in attempting to appease Bolshevism by food supplies we must make them feel the majesty of the law.

I am also ready to vote to refuse to the mails every sheet printed in any language other than English unless what is printed in a foreign tongue is translated in English in parallel columns. Ours has been the haven for the oppressed. But we must not, we shall not, allow our country to be the refuge of criminals who confuse liberty with license. While the Congress can do something along this line it can not do all that must be done. Our citizens generally must assist in an intensive campaign of education to emphasize the real meaning of Americanism.

A FOREIGN PROBLEM.

This leads me to say what I have said before, that the war has brought us a foreign problem of grave import. We are told we must avoid the "little American" policy in the interest of a world policy. In a word, we must abandon nationalism as provincial and accept internationalism as a cosmopolitan philanthropic duty. We must regard ourselves as the world's umpire. Even to-day every Congressman's mail brings appeals from Ireland, Armenia, Slovakia, Jugo-Slavia, Poland, China, Korea, and other countries for official assistance. These countries seem to deem it their right and our duty—hence the appeal.

While I have favored steps to reduce armaments and reconcile differences, I shall insist we must know precisely where these steps will lead. If the proposed league constitution includes within its jurisdiction such questions as immigration, deportation, tariff legislation, and the Monroe doctrine, then we must reserve the right to demand the exclusion of all those questions, for they are purely American questions not to be decided by a council in which we have but one vote. If article 10 allows the league to send our boys anywhere in the world then we should reserve our right to be exempt from the operation of that article. We should also demand that our right of withdrawal must be unconditional and until it is so declared we must not be bound.

We can ratify the treaty, including the league, which is mentioned seventy-nine times in the instrument, with reservations on the items mentioned. This will end the war between us and Germany as soon as both sign it. If our reservations will be accepted by our associates, we are in the league. If they refuse, which is simply incredible, for all the world knows we can name the conditions and they will gladly accept them, so anxious are they to have us in; but should they reject them, then we do not want to be in and should not be bound. This clears the way of all international embarrassment; it opens the way to become a member of the league without surrendering our sovereignty or independence, or submitting our destiny to a vote of foreign countries.

If the proponents are sincere in their claims that these questions are not included, then they will not refuse to accept our reservations, which writes it down plainly in the bond just what we mean in our obligation. The country must know the full import of the proposal as expressed by the President in his address to the Senate when he used these words:

> Every true heart in the world and every enlightened judgment demanded that, at whatever cost of independent action, every government that took thought for its people or for justice or for ordered freedom should lend itself to the new purpose and utterly destroy the old order of international politics.

I can not subscribe to the doctrine that the league of nations is of greater importance than the independence of this Republic.

Mr. Speaker, I have touched upon some of the problems before the country to-day as viewed by Republicans. I am convinced that Congress since the Civil War never faced greater responsibility. The Republicans regard themselves charged with a duty to meet and solve them in the interest of the people at large, and not in the interest of any particular class. The American people last year were challenged by our President, when he demanded a Democratic Congress. They answered that challenge by a decisive repudiation, in which there was delivered a merited rebuke for an attempt to interfere with the right of elections, and which was a magnificent vote of confidence in the Republican Party. We have accepted this vote, and will show by our record, I hope, that the people's confidence has not been misplaced, with a full realization that if we do not honor that confidence the country will withdraw it as quickly as it extended it. It will become the basis upon which the contest will be waged in 1920. I believe the country should be congratulated upon the outlook of Republican achievement up to date and the sure promise of Republican victory in 1920, which it demands in the interest of a Republic which up to date has stood for the institutions which have made her the pride, if not the envy, of the world.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to continue for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] There Chair hears none.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, in interrogating the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. RICKETTS] and in calling attention to what was repeated to me yesterday with regard to what are known as the "Big Five," the great packers, it seems they are able to run the gigantic packing business on borrowed capital, which is a subject that might be of great interest at some time here for amplification and illumination. We see the paper of many of them passing through the banks of the Eastern States. Much like Henry Ford, who is a great philanthropist, or was originally, they are, indeed, clever financial manipulators. In the case of Henry Ford, when we make an investigation, we find that every little dealer at a cross-roads throughout Pennsylvania and the country is obliged to deposit $1,000 as a guaranty of good faith on his part. That is a fine, easy way in which to get capital to run the business, but what of the philanthropy? That is legitimate, all right, but of the piety attached we will not speak. The point I wanted to make is this:

I might have been misunderstood by the gentleman from Ohio, that the Member from Illinois, while disclaiming that the five great packers control the situation, made the statement that there were dozens of other packing institutions in Chicago that had in recent years amassed mighty fortunes. He tells a story that will be worth while for the House to listen to when he comes here, and I hope you may not be denied the privilege of hearing that story narrated in his own inimitable way.

The Illinois Member tells of a firm of Hebrews who, I believe, were engaged in the second-hand clothing business, but found that the packing business was more profitable, apparently. I do not know whether or not he called the firm by the old name of Ketchem & Cheatem, but, anyhow, they went into the business. The Skinner firm was mentioned here to-day, and that suggested the old firm of Ketchem & Cheatem—there is such a firm, I believe, in Buffalo—and this Chicago firm now makes over $2,000,000 a year on very small capital. So I think this whole question is a worthy one for investigation.

The point I really wish to now make is this: I have known in this very city, the District of Columbia, over which alone Congress has jurisdiction, that there have been investigations made and disclosures brought in and laid before this House showing that the packing or cold-storage companies here control the retail dealers; that these companies deliver to these dealers the products of the agricultural districts at a fixed price and say, "If you do not sell them at that price, bring them back and we will destroy them." That is the crime that oppresses and bears down upon the householder and has brought about the justifiable call upon Congress for relief. We believe what was said here to-day; everybody believes it; but what the man with a family to feed wants is relief from the extortionate prices fixed somewhere after the produce leaves the farm until it reaches the home. What the people want is not continued tales, but effective action. [Applause.]

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES] for 10 minutes.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, it is growing late, and at the outset I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, I have been endeavoring to get a little time to make a short reply to an interview which was given out or published in the Washington Post on July 10 by my colleague, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, for whom I have a great deal of respect. Ordinarily I would have paid but little or no attention to it, but I feel that if I did not I would be doing an injustice to the broad, fair-minded people of the great State of which I in part have the honor to represent. The sentiment, if it can be called such, as set forth in this statement does not in the least reflect the sentiment and the feeling of the people of Kansas.

It may be that a majority of the people of Kansas are opposed to the President, politically speaking; a majority may not indorse his plan of a league of nations; I feel that I can safely say but few, if any, are so partisan as to indorse what the gentleman from Kansas said in that interview, when he stated—

> That European officials had gained concessions from the United States by flattering its Chief Executive, and that we had lost prestige throughout the world.

The people of the State of Kansas, regardless of politics, have always felt that all of the great men who have occupied the Executive chair are above being influenced in the manner set forth by the gentleman from Kansas. [Applause.]

I have lived in Kansas for 38 years. I know the people of that State. I know them to be a fair and broad-gauged people, therefore it is difficult for me to understand how the gentleman could indulge in the following:

> "The Presidency," said Representative CAMPBELL, "carries with it such great power that artful diplomats and international statesmen in other lands should not be tempted to beguile the President with unusual attentions and presents to exercise his power for the welfare of other people than those of the United States."

It may be that the gentleman from Kansas has lived in the atmosphere of the Capital so long that he has become thoroughly inoculated with the venom that is so plentiful in the Capital, and has, I am informed, always been against almost every President.

I want to say that is not up-to-date Kansas language nor Kansas thought. I wish to compare the above quotation from the interview of the gentleman to a quotation of the President's speech delivered in the Senate the same day this interview appeared. The President said:

> The rôle which America was to play in the conference seemed determined, as I have said, before my colleagues and I got to Paris—determined by the universal expectations of the nations whose representatives, drawn from all quarters of the globe, we were to deal with. It was universally recognized that America had entered the war to promote no private or peculiar interest of her own, but only as the champion of rights which she was glad to share with free men and lovers of justice everywhere. We had formulated the principles upon which the settlement was to be made—the principles upon which the armistice had been agreed to and the parleys of peace undertaken—and no one doubted that our desire was to see the treaty of peace formulated along the actual lines of those principles—and desired nothing else. We were welcomed as disinterested friends. We were resorted to as arbiters in many a difficult matter.

That kind of statesmanship is evidently beyond my colleague; he is afraid that the President of the United States can be so entertained, wined and dined, and tempted and beguiled with unusual attention and presents that he would "exercise his power for the welfare of other people than those of the United States." That is what the gentleman said, and that is not all he said. I quote another paragraph of that interview:

> The President wanted a league of nations. It was given to him. Those who sat with him at the peace table wanted to add more territory to their denuded domains, wanted more friendly harbors and control over smaller and weaker nations, wanted indemnity for losses sustained in the war, wanted security and prestige, and wanted the United States to share the burden of policing Europe and maintaining the boundaries of their nations. They got what they wanted.

I believe the gentleman will so regret that statement a year from now he will deny ever making it. Let us compare that to what the President said the same day, as follows:

> It had been our privilege to formulate the principles which were accepted as the basis of the peace, but they had been accepted, not because we had come in to hasten and assure the victory and insisted upon them but because they were readily acceded to as the principles to which honorable and enlightened minds everywhere had been bred. They spoke the conscience of the world as well as the conscience of America, and I am happy to pay my tribute of respect and gratitude to the able, forward-looking men with whom it was my privilege to cooperate for their unfailing spirit of cooperation, their constant effort to accommodate the interests they represented to the principles we were all agreed upon. The difficulties, which were many, lay in the circumstances, not often in the men. Almost without exception the men who led had caught the true and full vision of the problem of peace as an indivisible whole, a problem not of mere adjustments of interest, but of justice and right action.
> The atmosphere in which the conference worked seemed created not by the ambitions of strong Governments but by the hopes and aspirations of small nations and of peoples hitherto under bondage to the power that victory had shattered and destroyed.

Does that sound like the product from the mind of a man who was broad and fair minded or from one whose mind had become beclouded because of too much entertainment?

I wish to give you another quotation from the gentleman's interview:

> Mr. CAMPBELL said that when the President left Europe there were no plaudits for him from the people, and that the cordial feeling existing six months ago for America is now changed to hatred.

That does not coincide with what the President said the same day. He stated:

> We were generously accepted as the unaffected champions of what was right. It was a very responsible rôle to play; but I am happy to report that the fine group of Americans who helped with their expert advice in each part of the varied settlements sought in every transaction to justify the high confidence reposed in them.
> And that confidence, it seems to me, is the measure of our opportunity and of our duty in the days to come, in which the new hope of the peoples of the world is to be fulfilled or disappointed. The fact that America is the friend of the nations, whether they be rivals or associates, is no new fact; it is only the discovery of it by the rest of the world that is new.

It seems to depend on the viewpoint of the statesman. The President was over there and busily engaged in at least trying to bring about this ideal condition, while the gentleman from Kansas was here, 3,000 miles away, criticizing the President for having gone over. I am compelled to accept the President's view of how the responsible people of Europe feel toward us rather than that of the gentleman from Kansas, as I can not but feel the President had at least a little better chance to know the feeling of the people of Europe than my colleague.

The gentleman said "The President wanted a league of nations and he got it." Yes; he wanted it, and that is not all. Millions of others wanted it. I think it was on the same day of this interview I received a letter inclosing some resolutions passed by the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen in their convention held in Columbus, Ohio, which in part reads:

> Whereas President Wilson and the learned representatives of our allies and the neutral countries have formulated a plan which we hope will bring about closer cooperation among nations, with a view of avoiding future wars—the league of nations. Millions of mothers in the broken homes of the world are dreaming of it to-day. The spirits of 10,000,000 dead men, who but yesterday fell victims to the folly and criminal shortsightedness of man, are whispering their supplications into the ears of a just God, that national butchery shall cease and war shall be no more.
> [Applause.]
>
> And—
> Whereas in the titanic struggle between democracy and autocracy, Woodrow Wilson, our beloved President, the master interpreter of the principles of democracy and the brotherhood of man, has given voice to and made the whole world listen to those principles and ideals for which the workers have struggled and died from time immemorial, and has declared that weak nations must receive the same consideration in the affairs of the world as strong ones, and that this is the very basis of humane civilization.
> [Applause.]

And after setting forth a few more whereases, they—

Resolved, That the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen in national triennial convention assembled at Columbus, Ohio, hereby expresses its gratitude to and its willingness to support as a solid and united body the greatest, most eloquent, and honest advocate of the rights of the common people since the days of Lincoln, President Woodrow Wilson, and we pledge our lives and what we have of fortune to him and to our Government for the effecting and establishing of the humane aims and objects which he has outlined.

[Applause.]

These sturdy yoemen evidently have not heard "that European officials had gained concessions from the United States by flattering its Chief Executive, and that we had lost prestige throughout the world," and evidently they do not feel that the President has been so tempted and beguiled by attentions of artful diplomats as to cause him to exercise his power for the welfare of other people than those of the United States, and certainly from what they have said they do not agree with my worthy colleague, but are well pleased with his efforts.

On the day of the interview the President said:

The league of nations was not merely an instrument to adjust and remedy old wrongs under a new treaty of peace; it was the only hope for mankind. Again and again had the demon of war been cast out of the house of the peoples and the house swept clean by a treaty of peace, only to prepare a time when he would enter in again with spirits worse than himself. The house must now be given a tenant who could hold it against all such. Convenient, indeed indispensable, as statesmen found the newly planned league of nations to be for the execution of present plans of peace and reparation, they saw it in a new aspect before their work was finished. They saw it as the main object of the peace, as the only thing that could complete it or make it worth while. They saw it as the hope of the world, and that hope they did not dare to disappoint. Shall we or any other free people hesitate to accept this great duty? Dare we reject it and break the heart of the world?

But the gentleman from Kansas seems to think we should guard against such foolish statesmen and protect not only the United States but all future Presidents against allowing vainglory and lust of power to lead them astray.

As I do not want to misquote the gentleman, I will give you what appeared in the paper:

"We can not retrieve the past," he said. "We can only guard the future. If this bill shall become a law, neither vainglory nor lust for power will again lead the President to leave his own country and seat of government to engage in political controversies with statesmen and diplomats of other lands beyond the seas."

The President seemed to have an altogether different idea about his going to Europe than that of the gentleman from Kansas. He seemed to think it was a matter of duty and said:

We answered to the call of duty in a way so spirited, so utterly without thought of what we spent of blood or treasure, so effective, so worthy of the admiration of true men everywhere, so wrought out of the stuff of all that was heroic, that the whole world saw at last, in the flesh, in noble action, a great ideal asserted and vindicated by a Nation they had deemed material and now found to be compact of the spiritual forces that must free men of every nation from every unworthy bondage. It is thus that a new rôle and a new responsibility have come to this great Nation that we honor and which we would all wish to lift to yet higher levels of service and achievement.

The stage is set, the destiny disclosed. It has come about by no plan of our conceiving, but by the hand of God, who led us into the way. We can not turn back. We can only go forward, with lifted eyes and freshened spirit, to follow the vision. It was of this that we dreamed at our birth. America shall in truth show the way. The light streams upon the path ahead, and nowhere else.

I am sorry my colleague can not see it this way. There is no question in my mind but that he will see it this way by this time next year and will be telling the fair people of the State of Kansas that he had always been for the league of nations and was proud of the fact this great Nation of ours took the lead under the leadership and guidance of President Wilson, the very man and statesman he is now seeking to belittle. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired. All time has expired.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, July 28, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required for "civil government, Panama Canal and Canal Zone," for the fiscal year 1920, additional to the appropriation for this object contained in the sundry civil act of July 19, 1919 (H. Doc. No. 164), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.
